Difficulties in Processing the Acquired Language Knowledge to Adults

ABSTRACT

Encouraging adults to learn a foreign language (English in our case) may be considered a challenge not only for the person involved in the acquisition process but also for the one that performs the teaching activity. It is a complex process since adults' expectations are higher than children's; they generally believe that their mental abilities, the maturity and the seriousness specific to the age would make them acquire everything that they are taught easier and faster. They are anxious to make proof of immediate improvement in the use of the language and, in case they don't feel a relevant progress from the very beginning, they are discouraged and tend to consider the study of a new language an impossible and uninteresting activity. Their main difficulty is not so much related to remembering the grammar rules, the vocabulary items and other structures taught in class but it has to do with the ability to process them in various situations, different from the patterns in which they were used during the course. The main idea is that they are not willing to use the creative spontaneity, to urge and finally that generally characterize children's communication. They are hindered by various personal misconceptions and fears. This is an essential issue that in the end to develop and thoroughly analyse in the present paper.

KEYWORDS: processing, vocabulary, adults, abilities, effective communication

Adults' learning needs

There are many reasons that determine adults to start learning a foreign language. Some of them perceive it as a sort of hobby, an interesting and enjoyable way of spending their free time while others consider it a necessary and indispensable task they have to fulfil in order to get a better job, to be promoted or, in some cases to maintain their present job; other simply want to be in touch with the current technology and, as English is widely used in these situations, adults feel the need to acquire and develop the necessary language skills which are vital for their virtual communication. However, whether English is studied by pleasure or by obligation, the teacher has to find the right way to turn the teaching process into an enjoyable activity that stimulates different adults with different needs and motivations.

At the very first sight, it doesn't seem to be so complicated. After all, every teaching activity involves a consistent effort from the part of the teacher to transform the subject that he/she teaches in a pleasant and stimulating performance (activity). But in the case of adults the acquisition of a foreign language is not part of their compulsory daily tasks (as it is in the case of school children); it is an additional effort and challenge to their everyday work. Therefore, the English teacher should focus more on the selection of materials (which should be in accordance with the adults' main purpose for studying the language) and on identifying the proper means to turn the lesson into an attractive extra work activity. The teacher should give them a lot without making them feel stressed or uncomfortable. Moreover, the teacher should have in view the length of time that the adult intends to study English in order to use it. While some adults don't see an exact limit to the length of time they want to learn the language, others are pressed by their main job circumstances or other situations to develop their fluency in English in quite a short period of time; in this case, there is a sort of pressure that the learner may feel and a fear of not being able to accomplish the target they were imposed or that arose from the very beginning. It is essential for the teacher to have in view all these aspects before proceeding to the teaching process itself. Ronald Carter and David Nunan bring all these points in a discussion in their book entitled "The Cambridge Guide to Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages"

The key defining feature of ESP is that its teaching and materials are founded on the results of needs analysis. The first question when starting preparation for teaching an ESP course is almost always: What do students need to do with English? Which of the skills do they need to master and how well? Which genres do they need to master, either for comprehension or production purposes? (...) However, in ESP, one can be more precise about learners' needs; their needs are defined by learning or occupational situation in which English plays a key role (...) in contrast, for students not immediately using English, or about to use it, needs are much more general.

It's not easy to choose the right English books to be used; besides learners' needs, the teacher should see his/her current language level on the basis of a placement test and these are not obviously all the matters to be taken into account. However once the English teacher decided what to do in class, he/she should not stick exactly to a book. Additional exercises or fun like activities are useful in developing skills or abilities that learners may not master really well. Some students need more practice of the listening skills while others may feel reluctant to speak. Decoding the message of a reading passage or formulating written paragraphs may be difficult as well. Lately, it has been widely spread among methodologists the idea that the basic four skills of the language (reading, listening, speaking and writing) are easier to acquire if used in proper contexts, derived from everyday situations.

Decoding the meaning of instant messages

In the case of vocabulary, useful common conversational items are interesting and stimulate the adult to acquire and remember better new words and set phrases. Lists of anonyms, synonyms and all kinds of word enumerations improve the acquisition process. Still, in time, some words are remembered, others are forgotten. In other Cases although the adult knows the meaning of a word, he/she may not be sure if it is properly used in another situation different from the one in which he/she was presented. Learning words, remembering and using them are complex issues that give rise to a large number of questions and debates.

Central to research in vocabulary learning are key questions concerning how words are learned. Teachers help learners with vocabulary directly or “explicitly” by means of word lists paired translation equivalents and in variously related semantic sets. They also help learners by more indirect or “implicit” means, such as exposure to words in the context of reading real texts. Over many years a key question asked by teachers and researchers is “What does it mean to learn a word?” A definition of learning a word depends totally on what we mean by a word on how a word is remembered over what period of time and in what circumstances it is remembered and whether learning a word also means that it is always retained”.

(Gardner & Nunan, 2001: 42)

It is impossible for the teacher to present all the situations or set phrases in which a word may be used. Therefore, he/she should encourage students to be “flexible” and adapt their vocabulary knowledge to each particular situation they come across. Learning by heart new words is pointless if students cannot cope with them in different contexts. Several months ago, I had to teach a business course to the employees of a well-known international company which produces cars. There were mainly managers that had been previously trained in the use of the English language and needed to improve since they had to deal with many foreigners from different countries. One of the course attendants told me about a situation he had to go through while discussing with a Belgium colleague. It was something of the kind:

The Romanian employee: “Did you send the email with the proper sketch to the new English manager?”

The Belgium colleague: “No, I didn’t. I preferred to hand it to him. Have you met him in person?”

The Romanian employee: “No, I’m sorry. I haven’t had the occasion so far”.

The Belgium colleague: “Oh, he’s such a proper gentleman!”

The Romanian employee: “I can’t understand. What do you mean?”

The meaning of the first word “proper” is “appropriateness” or “suitability” while the second is intended to describe a person that follows the conventions of the social behaviour. Being accustomed only with the first use of the word, the Romanian employee couldn’t grasp the sense of the other sentence. Thus, the acquisition of vocabulary items cannot be reduced only to retaining them in fixed set phrases or situations. It is a much more complex matter that has to do with the teacher’s attitude in class and the students’ participation. Better said, the teaching process should rely on the learner, not on the teacher. The learner has to be stimulated to be independent in performing the communicative tasks.

When teaching is learner centered, the role of the teacher changes (...). Learner-centered teachers are guides, facilitators and designers of learning experiences. They are no longer the main performer, the one with the most lines, or the one working harder than everyone else to make it all happen. The action in the learner-centered classroom features the students. Teaching action expedites learning. This includes the careful design of experiences, activities and assignments through which the students encounter the content.

(Weimer, 2002: XVIII)

Generally, English teachers tend to give too much attention to the language skills they possess instead of directing their efforts towards learning. This is because there is a general belief that the learning process is the obvious result of a good teaching. This is only partially true. We can not assume that an effective teacher will always "produce" well-prepared students. Students have their own duties they must fulfil and play an essential role in achieving a successful acquisition of the language.

The learning outcomes of teaching can not be assumed or taken for granted. (...) Being learner centered focuses squarely on learning what the student is learning, how the student is learning, the conditions under which the student is learning, whether the student is retaining and applying the learning (...). This learner-centered orientation accepts, cultivates and builds on the ultimate responsibility students have for learning. Teachers can not do it for students. They may set the stage, so to speak, and help out during rehearsals, but then it is up to students to perform.

(Weimer, 2002: XI-XVI)

In other words, adults have to bring their own personal substantial contribution to the acquisition process. They have to be willing to involve themselves in various ways by allowing some time for personal study, by achieving the tasks required during the course, by being ready to overcome some inner obstacles that generally hinder them such as: "I can understand the lines of the conversation but I cannot reproduce them"; "I am no longer young so I don't think I'll be able to learn English", "I have tried to study English before, by myself and I think it's a really difficult language", "I don't have the courage to speak...I'm sure I'll make a lot of mistakes and I'll make a fool of myself", etc. Adults need to understand to overcome some misconceptions; a foreign language can be learned at any age and the progress is made step by step, not all of a sudden. They have to be patient and not to wait for an overnight miracle. Nothing can be done if all of these aspects are not discussed and removed since they can seriously affect the teaching process.

Another tendency that adults often have is the fact that although they are used to memorize a large quantity of information and they can remember vocabulary items or grammar rules easier than children, they find it really difficult to transfer their language knowledge to practice. The personal fears and misconceptions that I have already mentioned previously sometimes stop them from reaching their goal. Moreover,

Some people think that (at least with behaviourist psychology) that one size fits all for learning; give the same to all students and they will learn equally- at last that is how it should go, but we teachers know a different reality, one that shows that each student reacts in a different manner. How is it in a context (...) in social-cognitive psychology stresses that people learn by chunking new information with existing knowledge and that meaning plays a key role in forming those chunks. In other words, learning cannot take place in isolation from what learners already know about a topic and meaning provides a purpose for that learning because it enables deeper thinking to take place.

(Farrell & Jacobs, 2010: 58)

Expanding thinking skills in class is perhaps one of the most difficult problems English teachers confront with. It is not easy to make an adult think in a foreign language he/she hasn't used before or has used (but not always in the good way) and develop his/her particular abilities to adapt to each particular situation by using the information taught in the course. I really believe that this is the aim that should be attained and the teacher can bring much of his contribution to realize it. Still, we don't have to forge it. This achievement cannot be done unless the adult involved doesn't take the trouble to work well enough in order to become a successful communicator in English.

Among the many strategies that our students need to acquire and use to succeed in our classes are those that involve going beyond the information given and utilizing and building their Thinking Skills (Paul & Elder, 2006). Critical thinking for teachers of second or foreign languages generally means education language students to think about their thinking, and then to decide if it needs improvement (...) "Critical and creative thinking" (...) can be learned while at the same time recognizing the uniqueness of individual students.

Teaching adults is a complex issue. The English teacher has to weigh their needs, to understand their fears, to adapt his/her materials according to their inclinations, to enforce their thinking spontaneously in the use of the language in new contexts besides the ones they were familiarised with in the course, to stimulate independent oral and written communication, to create an enjoyable atmosphere by involving them in games like activities that distance adults from the stress of being in touch with a foreign language, etc. Elsa Auerbach provides some "guiding principles" derived from her own experience related to teaching English as a foreign language.

- Start with learners' needs and interests.
- Involve learners in determining the content of instruction.
- Focus on meaning, not mechanisms.
- Don't expect to work on form (connect form to function and meaning).
- Don't enter instruction around themes drawn from learners' social reality.
- Encourage dialogue and critical analysis of social realities.
- Use a variety of participatory tools to explore themes.
- Move toward action outside the classroom.
- Involve students in evaluation.

All in all, the English teacher should bear in mind that each adult is a special individual and should be treated as such. Therefore, flexibility is essential both on the side of the teacher who has to be ready to adjust to the needs of the adult learner and on the side of the adult who has to be willing to learn and ready to change his/her attitude towards the acquisition of a foreign language, if this is not the appropriate one.

ABSTRACT

This article belongs to the domain of foreign language teaching, i.e., learning/practising a foreign language, in this case Romanian/French, by the technique of bringing in to contact two people. Tandem or self-directed learning of languages in pairs in secondary contexts can be defined as a form of open learning, where people of different mother tongues work in pairs. This learning method does not replace language courses, but meets a need that every human being open to new may feel. The motivation of those involved is various: discovering partner's person and culture, improving language knowledge, mutual exchange of knowledge/information from favourite areas etc. The two principles underlying learning strategy are the principle of reciprocity and autonomy. Although emerged in the European area in the second half of the 60s, tandem appears not to take root in the Danubian-Pan-European area. This paper aims to present this type of activity to examine how it works as objectively as possible in a university environment to provide some useful strategies, to inventory the problems that occurred.

KEYWORDS: tandem, the principle of autonomy, the principle reciprocity, working methods

Context

This research was possible due to the international project Tandem, bilinguisme et construction des savoirs disciplinaires – une approche du FLE/FOS en contact avec les langues de l'ECO [Tandem, bilingualism and construction of disciplinary knowledge – an approach of French as a foreign language or French with specific objectives in contact with the languages of central and Eastern Europe] funded by the French University Agency (AUF – Agence Universitaire de la Francophonie), initiated and coordinated by Lecturer PhD Aurora Băgiag, held at the “Iuliu-Hațieganu” University of Medicine and Pharmacy of Cluj-Napoca, Romania, in the period 2012-2014 (partner universities: “Babeș-Bolyai” University of Cluj-Napoca, Romania, “Matej Bel” University of Slovakia, University of Geneva, University of Luxembourg).

Argument. Structure

Cultural diversity is not a recent phenomenon in the European area, but as we are witnessing a growing mobility, fundamental principles and values are required to be (re-)emphasized and (re-)analyzed on the one hand, and on the other hand, it is required to bring about new strategies favourable to cultural exchange¹. To live together peacefully, Thorbjørn Jagland, the Secretary General of the Council of Europe, says that there should be created areas where intercultural dialogue can flourish². A large number of political actions promoting intercultural dialogue are intended to educate citizens in a democratic spirit. Therefore, education system is a solid brick, made to consolidate the whole process. In this huge mechanism, the didactics of foreign languages is one of the areas with major responsibilities. Learning a foreign language broadens perspectives; it contributes to lowering down emotional walls and destroys identities stereotypes. *“Language learning helps learners to avoid thinking in stereotypes of the other, to develop their curiosity and openness to otherness and to discover other cultures. It also helps them realize that the interaction between people of different social identity and culture is enriching.”*³ (General Council of Europe, Strasbourg, 7 May 2008). Foreign language teaching and learning process carried out either in a formal environment – school, university, cultural centres – or in an informal environment such as youth associations, volunteering, extracurricular activities, etc. “enjoys” a special attention from the part of the European Council which encourages and supports these types of initiatives. *“The Council of Europe has encouraged Member States to promote non-formal education and to encourage the commitment and contribution of young people to the founding values of intercultural dialogue.”*⁴

For these reasons, we thought important to present a cultural intercultural dialogue held in Cluj-Napoca, at the “Iuliu Hațieganu”, University of Medicine and Pharmacy, Romania, as part of the international project Tandem, bilingualism and construction of disciplinary knowledge – an approach of FLE/FOS in contact with the languages of the EDO (2012-2014). The intercultural context chosen in this research is learning a foreign language as part of the working method called tandem or self-directed learning in secondary contexts. The two confronted cultures were Romanian and French.

We were interested how intercultural dialogue of a group of French medical students (“Iuliu Hațieganu” Faculty of Medicine and Pharmacy of Cluj-Napoca, Romania), brought face to face with a heterogeneous group of Romanian students (from various faculties: Chemistry, Environmental Protection, Sociology, etc.) of “Babes-Bolyai” University of Cluj-Napoca, Romania is achieved. Our research shall be structured in two parts. The first part will include clarifications concerning the terminology used; we shall focus on the history of this method and its path in European countries. In the second part we shall show how we have applied this working technique, here, in Romania, in Cluj academic environment. Therefore, this article aims to present in a manner rather educational the technique of learning a foreign language according to the tandem method.

Part I: General overview

Term definition

After the “father of learner autonomy”, the French researcher Henri Holc (1979) has defined and conceptualized the terms of autonomy, self-directed learning; they represented a point of attraction for researchers based on foreign language learning in self-directed contexts (Schmeller, 2006) being used increasingly frequently in debates on foreign language didactics in the last thirty years. The emergence of a number of debates is the outcome of various linguistic and socio-cultural factors, such as: the emergence of minority groups, the development of language sciences, the contribution of cognitive psychology, the advent of new technology, etc.⁵

Tandem is a form of open learning, with a high degree of autonomy, where people of different native languages work together. The motivations of those participating in tandem, according to the studies carried out, fall within three categories: a. discovery of the individual and partner's culture; b. language skills improvement and training; c. mutual exchange of opinions in various fields. Tandem is a concrete form of multiculturalism.

Authentic communication with a native speaker enables intercultural dialogue as an expression of modernity and modernization. On the other hand, self-directed learning of languages in pairs, if conducted in academic/school environments, aims at different forms of authority therefore it is a direct relationship between traditional education and education focused on counselling and mutual support.

Short history

Learning through tandem was introduced around 1930, has undergone various stages and forms⁷. The concept of tandem began to take shape in the second half of the 60s in the German area around OFAJ, the Franco-German Youth Association (l'Office Franco-Allemand pour la Jeunesse). In the late 70s, the researcher Jürgen WOFF, supported by a group of teachers in Madrid, confronts some tourists with the natives of the host country; each participant intended to the language and culture of his tandem partner. Work was carried out outside school “reservoirs” with a working material (starting point) represented by some documents with suggestions – types of activities and useful tips from teachers.

This method witnesses a considerable development around the 80s (Garnier-Tardeu, 2006) when two-person teams of foreign students and local students are formed inside universities (Müller, Werenschlö & Wolff, 1989). In recent years, various tandems have been made to meet the various demands, needs and professional categories⁸. Due to technology development tandem experienced the highest expansion in European countries. Therefore, there are several types of tandem: face to face tandem, In-erline tandem (tele-tandem, e-tandem etc.), tandem by mail. This article shall focus on face to face tandem.

Principles

Tandem is based on two fundamental principles: the principle of reciprocity and of autonomy. The principle of reciprocity requires the mutual support of the partners; the two are called to “take advantage” in a fair manner. The energy invested should be directly proportional to the energy received⁹. This does not mean that the two parties must verbally count the time when practicing the foreign language and compare it to that of the partner, but it is rather a mutual involvement that will lead to the successes of every meeting. Another benefit of tandem, generated by principle of reciprocity, is to diminish inhibitions as both partners play at the same time the role of “student” and “teacher” leading to an attitude of empathy, tolerance and patience¹⁰.

To talk about the principle autonomy within tandem, we think it is necessary to define the term. Autonomy, according to French didactics, is the ability to assume responsibility for own acts/things. In this context, while learning a language, autonomy is the ability to assume own learning process. This ability is not innate, but must be acquired, either naturally, or through a formal learning process in a systematic and reflecting manner¹¹. Therefore, the principle of autonomy within tandem implies a responsibility of each participating member, in other words, each of the two partners is responsible for own learning process. In particular, it refers to the ability and at the same time, the freedom to choose when, where and what to study. In case of self-directed learning (like tandem), setting goals, monitoring progress, finding strategies and communication/comprehension techniques lie, first of all, with the individual working in pairs. On the other hand, autonomy is closely related to the degree of maturity. Each participant needs to know clearly his/her expectations from his/her partner and not only that, to ask him/her for these expectations explicitly (in case of face to face tandem, orally)¹².

Premises

The context in which tandem is carried out is closely related to the two principles outlined above. If tandem is not held in an institutional environment, the two have complete freedom in the selection of contents. If carried out in a “school” environment, in our case, a university – within a project that involves partnerships between universities – counsellors must take into account the fact that it requires a different approach than the one established in language courses. (Tandem is a type of interactive and voluntary activity, which, however, does not replace language courses). The smooth development of tandem depends on the compliance with the two principles: autonomy and reciprocity. Therefore, the two partners get the help of intercultural exercises (designed by teachers/specialists in teaching foreign languages, which – indication should be made – is only a starting point, a guide) structured on the two principles of tandem. Once the goals have been established, the counsellor has suggested the material, expectations were communicated explicitly, and the two partners will find their own methods, techniques and communication strategies¹³.

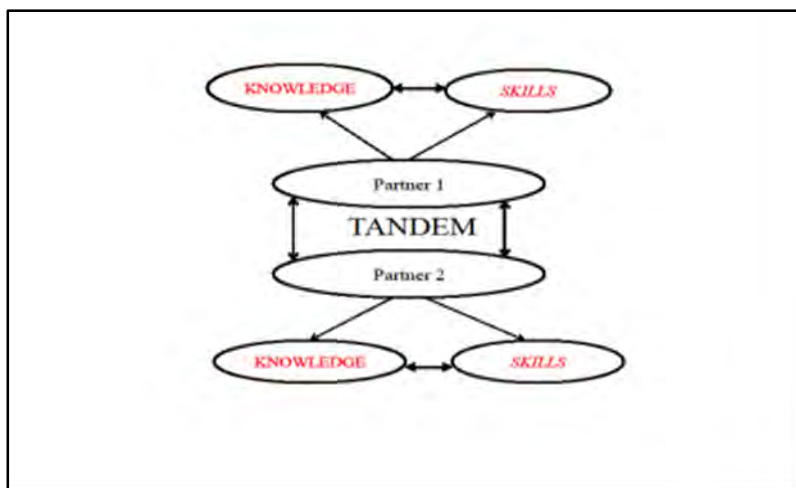

Fig. 1. Communication in Tandem (Schmelter, 2006: 199)

Part II: Tandem in Cluj university environment

The second part of our study will be structured on the pattern question and answer. We chose this type of presentation for reasons of brevity and clarity. Answers to questions is a summary of read references and personal observations resulting from organizing tutoring sessions, analysis of portfolio received, feedback from the students.

1. Why tandem in Cluj-Napoca?

Answer: Firstly, because Cluj is a cosmopolitan city with intense cultural exchanges fostered by the presence of large numbers of foreign students. One example can be very conclusive. Within "Iuliu Haieganu" University of Medicine and Pharmacy, according to university website, there are 2208 foreign students and 6386 Romanian students enrolled in the academic year 2013-2014¹⁹. Therefore, the aforementioned international project favouring intercultural dialogue, language skills improvement and training and mutual exchange of views in different fields (specially, the medical field) has been initiated in the Department of Modern Languages Applied to Medicine.

2. For whom is tandem intended? Even for beginners?

Answer: Tandem is for all those who are open to new. In terms of level of language proficiency, specialized literature believes that beginners should not be oriented towards this type of activity (Brammes & Kleppin, 2002: 95). On the other hand, in case of self-directed learning, we believe that we must take into account the maturity of those eager to learn. In this case, there are people who can work effectively in pairs even if they have poor knowledge of the respective language. In the academic year 2013-2014, I coordinated pairs of French-speaking medical students (General Medicine, Dentistry) with A1/A2 language level and Romanian medical/philologists/chemists/historians/sociologists students, A2/B1 level. The results exceeded expectations. The clarification that we believe is required to be made is: the success of dialogue is mainly due to students' motivation and concerns/affinities/training. Should we take a single example, medical students, French and Romanian, with a beginner language level, in the first year of study, have participated in several specialized courses of their partners (in Romanian, respectively, in French). As a result of a questionnaire that we administered – regarding specialized language comprehension – most students said they understood about 40-60% of the entire course. Comprehension was due to students' knowledge in the special field, the similarity of the two languages (French / Romanian), the teaching material (power point), but also teacher's mimes and gestures. In this perfect universe consisting of two people who communicate and help each other, the question that arises is:

3. What is the role of the counsellor?¹⁵

Answer¹⁶: First, the counsellor is proposing his activity, brings students in to contact and supervises the entire process. A counsellor is a well-to-do outsider («ex-écricur bienveillant») who helps students after their failures and successes. He is the one who provides the conceptual elements, provides methodological information (which will allow partners to develop working techniques), documents underlying learning, possible activities, supports learning process from the psychological point of view¹⁷. He can not always solve problems, but it can pull a signal and provide support in overcoming the obstacles that may arise.

4. Can tandem partner substitute the teacher?

Answer: No. Following the advice of several pairs (about 40), I noticed that quite often, tandem partners fail to provide satisfactory answers regarding grammar rules. Students with A1, A2 language level explicitly require clarification of grammar issues. If they do not receive a satisfactory answer, they address the counsellor (course teacher).

5. What are students' favourite topics?

Answer: Selected topics are the result of some temporal, professional and relational "conditionings". For instance, during November – December / April – May, students focused on discovering the traditions of his/her partner (of 40 coordinated students, 32 have chosen the sheet Traditions of Christmas/Easter); medical students who worked with philologists students chose cultural and educational topics such as: Education, Culture, Cultural Clashes, A Traditional Story, The Place of Religion in Society etc. The "universal" topics chosen by students, regardless of nationality, cultural background or language were: Let us introduce ourselves, Weather, Humour, Food, Anniversary, Personal Documents.

6. What happens if one partner does not cooperate (is disinterested)?

Answer: Tandem is a free and voluntary activity. In this case, if a student does not cooperate or if one partner is not satisfied with the work of the other, there will be organized counselling sessions (with both partners present), and if complaints persist, the couple waives collaboration, but no the tandem. The counsellor ensures finding another partner in the shortest time possible. (This means a “database” of eager students that each counsellor should have.)

Conclusions

Self-directed system holds an important place in the knowledge of a culture. Faced with increasing mobility in the current context of globalization, students need to be given new possibilities and perspectives. Therefore, we believe that tandem is a modern and effective alternative, suitable for academic environment often stifled by traditional language courses; actual assessment of its usefulness rests with the students.

La métaphore phallique en argot*

ABSTRACT: Phallic Metaphor in Slang

In this article we aim to show why the phallic metaphor is extremely present in the argo language everywhere. We will insist upon the existence, in human history, of a veritable cult of phalluses – both with an apotropaic purpose, of protection against evil spirits as well as a humorous one –, but also of an undeniable masculine character that every argo possesses. And this is because the argo language, in spite of some exceptions, some of them notable, was and still is by definition, masculine, men being always the makers, but also competent users of these ebulliently inventive lexical creations.

KEYWORDS: slang, metaphor, phallic terms, literature, symbol

Introduction

Un des puissants champs lexicaux métaphoriques est dans l'argot celui des parties du corps humain, entre elles la place d'honneur appartenant aux organes sexuels, ceux des femmes et en particulier, ceux des mâles, car « argoul dezvoltă, ca orice limbă populară, multe metafore expresive pentru părțile corpului : în special pentru cap, față (gură, ochi, nas), mână, organele sexuale » (Zăfăruș, 2010 : 56) (« l'argot développe, comme toute langue populaire, de nombreuses métaphores expressives pour les parties du corps et en particulier la tête, le visage (bouche, yeux, nez), de la main, les organes génitaux »).

La position privilégiée dans l'argot sexuel est occupée par les termes utilisés pour désigner les organes sexuels masculins et surtout le « pénis », car, chose un peu curieuse, pour les sociétés, l'autre composant important de ceux-ci, il y a beaucoup moins de dénominations en argot et qui s'explique principalement par la « visibilité » accrue du premier (notamment dans un certain érotisme), par rapport à ceux-ci, qui, bien qu'importants, sont toujours éclipseés, « cachés ».

Probablement responsable de la pléthore de termes terminologie dans l'argot est le culte du phallus « isolated, erect penises as a symbol of power and fertility. Their purpose was usually apotropaic, to promote health and increase by warding off evil, and humorous. » (Younger, 2005 : 146). (« des pénis isolés, en érection comme un symbole de puissance et de la fertilité. Leur but était généralement européen, pour promouvoir et attirer l'attention sur la santé et le bien-être, et l'humouristique »). « À propos du pénis en érection, l'éloge de grâce convoité ou, le fantasme érotique, le symbole de la virilité, signe sans lequel un homme ne se sent plus homme, ou n'est plus considéré comme un homme – « the impotent man was more mocked than pitied » (van Driel, 2010 : 36) (« envers l'homme impuissant on a manifesté plus de pitié et d'ironie que de la pitié »), a été analysé de nombreuses cultures, de l'Antiquité à nos jours »

* Cette étude a été financée par le contract POSDRU/159/1.5/S/133255, ID de projet 133255 (2014), cofinancé du Fonds social européen, par le Programme opérationnel sectoriel de développement des ressources humaines 2007-2013.

Phallic symbols were used in Spain, France, Ireland, Scandinavia, Egypt, Greece, Rome, Syria, Persia, and Asia Minor; among the mound builders of North America, in Mexico, Central America, Peru, Haiti, in the islands of the Pacific and in Africa. Many of the literary references, paintings, and sculptures relating to the subject which have come down to us are so direct and realistic that they can not be printed.

Comme l'avait remarqué Angus McLaren, « In the ancient world the erect penis was a symbol of maturity and power. » (2007 : 4) (« Dans le monde antique, le pénis en érection était un symbole de maturité et de puissance. »), le résultat est, depuis les temps antiques, étonnamment la présence de l'art et de la littérature de nombreux symboles phalliques. Dans les cultures primitives, le pénis en érection est ressenti comme une menace, ce qui conduit à une exagération des dimensions que celui-ci peut atteindre, parce que « if the erection of the penis is used as a threatening display of male dominance, then it follows that the greater the erection, the greater the threat. » (Morris, 1996 : 106) (« si l'érection du pénis est utilisée comme la visualisation du danger de la domination masculine, il s'ensuit que plus l'érection est grande, plus la menace est grande »). Ainsi, selon le même auteur, le corps de l'homme disparaît (presque) entièrement des représentations, remplacé simplement par un énorme pénis, bien évidemment à la verticale. De ce type de représentation, « it is only one more step to the world of phallic symbolism, where almost any long, stiff, erect object can take on a phallic role. » (Ibid. : 107) (« il n'y a plus qu'un pas jusqu'au monde du symbolisme phallique, où presque tout objet long, raid, dressé peut prendre le rôle phallique. »)

Sur le symbolisme phallique

Tout au long de l'histoire de la civilisation humaine, s'inspirant de la nature ou de ses propres créations, l'homme a attribué un symbolisme phallique à de nombreuses plantes, animaux ou objets. Ainsi, dans plusieurs langues, les oiseaux ont des connotations sexuelles, en chinois même le nom qui signifie « oiseau », niao, désigne aussi le « pénis » (Biedermann, 1992 : 39). Également en chinois, le mot ya « Yannard » est un sujet d'abus dans de nombreuses zones, car il signifie, selon la région, aussi bien « pénis », que « homosexuel » (Ibid. : 106). Autrefois un signe de noblesse, porté sur la main gantée, le faucon, oiseau de proie et agressif, « désigne aussi fréquemment le pénis. » (Chevalier & Gheerbrant, 1990 : s.v.). Un autre oiseau, le coq, par son puissant insinuation de territorialité et en particulier sa disponibilité sans relâche pour se reproduire, est aussi un symbole de la masculinité puissante. (Biedermann, 1992 : 288). Sa virilité et sa fierté proverbiale ont fait de lui l'un des symboles nationaux de la France ! En roumain, il existe l'expression a cânta cocoșul (într-o casă) (lire « Chanter le coq (dans une maison) »), utilisée pour montrer que dans la famille en question, c'est l'homme qui a le mot décisif, ou bien, en français, on dit « faire le coq » à l'égard d'un homme qui tente de séduire une femme. Dans l'interprétation psychanalytique, un autre oiseau, la cigogne, en fait son bec, représente le phallus et le lieu d'où elle apporte les enfants, l'utérus. (Ibid. : 329). Enfin, pour certaines peuples, même le minuscule colibri est un symbole phallique, comme c'est le cas des Indiens Tukano de Colombie, pour lesquels ce petit oiseau « censé coïter avec les fleurs, représente le pénis, l'érection, la virilité radieuse » (Chevalier & Gheerbrant, 1990 : s.v.).

Aux animaux aussi, on leur a attribué un symbolisme phallique, ou sexuel, car au Moyen Âge « en argot, l'animal, la bête, le cheval, c'est le pénis, et c'est parfois aussi la femme, incarnant la partie animale, sinon satanique de l'homme » (Ibid. : s.v.). Cela se produit par exemple, dans le cas de l'éléphant (à cause de son trompe) (Biedermann, 117) ou du rhinocéros, pour lequel le symbole phallique est consacré par la corne, car celle-ci non seulement par sa force suggère le pouvoir, mais par sa fonction naturelle « est image de l'arme puissante (en argot italien, le pénis s'appelle torno). » (Chevalier & Gheerbrant, 1990 : 289). Biedermann note que dans l'iconographie occidentale, la même corne, qui est à l'origine un symbole phallique, est associée, dans le cas de la licorne, à l'intelligence, car elle augmente de la tête de l'animal. Elle devient ainsi un symbole de pureté et de force, et dans le monde médiéval on pensait qu'elle ne pouvait être prise qu'à l'aide d'une vierge, sur les genoux de laquelle elle irait se reposer avant d'être tuée par les chasseurs. (Ibid. : 360).

En aparté médiéval-moderne, voir à ce sujet l'excellente chanson composée par le groupe roumain Phoenix (album CantaFabule, 1975), intitulée Norocul inorogului (« La chance de la licorne »). Les paroles du début et de la fin de la chanson sont chantées en français ancien et appartiennent au poète anglo-normand Philippe de Thaün, mieux connu pour son Bestiaire, dont du 2^e chapitre (Monoceros) celles-ci ont été prises. Les autres vers, chantés en roumain, appartiennent à Șerban Foartă et à Andrei Ujică.

D'autres créatures également de l'imaginaire grenouille (les psychanalyses voient dans le barbatien se glissant dans le lit de la princesse le symbole du pénis, qui ne peut pas atteindre la « complétude » qu'en étant attrapé par le partenaire sexuel) (Ibid. : 146-147), au plus connu serpent (dont le corps, dans l'interprétation des rêves, serait le pénis et sa tête triangulaire n'est rien d'autre que le triangle du pubis féminin) représentent de symboles phalliques et sexuels. (Ibid. : 312). Apparaissent au serpent par sa morphologie et aux symboles aquatiques par son habit, l'anguille, « a gardé une connotation sexuelle dans l'argot moderne qui emploie parfois l'image "anguille de calecif" pour désigner le pénis » (Chevalier & Gheerbranx 1990 : s.v.).

Le règne végétal est également présent dans ce symbolisme phallique par l'arbre de la vie qui, bien qu'à l'origine peut être considéré comme l'image de l'« androgyne originel », « au plan du monde phénoménal, le tronc dressé vers le ciel, symbole de force et de puissance éminemment solaire, est bien le Phallus, image archétypale du père ». (Ibid. : s.v.) Certaines espèces de champignons associés à la fertilité et à la puissance de par leur forme phallique, deviennent de tels symboles (Biedermann, 1992 : 232).

Même les phénomènes naturels deviennent dans certaines cultures, des symboles phalliques. La foudre est comparée avec la sécrétion du sperme, représentée dans la culture hébraïque « l'acte viril de Dieu dans la création », ou même plus, pour les aborigènes australiens il représente « un pénis grandissant » (Chevalier & Gheerbranx 1990 : s.v.).

Des objets avec un symbolisme phallique indubitable, nous allons énumérer les menhirs (« considered by some to be phallic monuments », Biedermann, 1992 : 219), (« Considérés par certains comme des monuments phalliques »), les obélisques (bien que dans leur cas, il est impossible de dire aujourd'hui si le premier obélisque représente « a phallic fertility symbol or a stone axis mundi », Ibid. : 243-244) (« un symbole phallique de la fertilité ou une pierre axis mundi ») et les piliers ou les colonnes qui, outre les fonctions religieuses, ont servi à célébrer les victoires militaires et l'exemple que Biedermann (1992 : 268) mentionne est important pour les Roumains car il s'agit de la colonne de Trajan (ou la colonne Trajane) de Rome. Pour les psychanalyses, leur importance est essentiellement phallique.

En ce qui suit nous nous tournons vers deux parties du corps humain lui-même, qui ont reçu de telles interprétations. Il s'agit en particulier, de la jambe d'une femme, que, disent les psychanalyses, l'enfant perçoit « as a substitute for the missing penis of her sex; this is believed to explain the unusual form of male sexual deviation known as foot and shoe fetishism » (Biedermann, 1992 : 140-141). (« Comme un substitut du pénis manquant de son sexe ; ce la est censé expliquer la forme inhabituelle de la déviation sexuelle mâle appelée le fétichisme du pied et de la chaussure »).

Il y a dans certaines traditions la croyance qu'il existe une relation étroite entre le nez d'un homme et son pénis, plus précisément entre la taille du nez et la longueur du pénis, ce qui a fait, par exemple, que dans les représentations des ancêtres des Mélanésiens, ceux-ci soient représentés avec un nez qui s'étendait jusqu'aux organes génitaux (Ibid. : 239-240).

Enfin, pour conclure cette digression non exhaustive dans le symbolisme phallique, nous nous arrêterons aux objets fabriqués par l'homme et qui, de toute évidence en suite, ont été interprétés comme des symboles phalliques. Il s'agit, tout d'abord, du balai, dont l'image entre les jambes d'une sorcière nue a été interprétée

Comme un symbole phallique. En outre, l'épée (le sabre), dans la psychologie freudienne du 20^e siècle, a été considérée comme un symbole phallique, ou mâle (Ibid. : 335). Enfin, la charrue, beaucoup plus pacifique que l'épée (ou même que le domestique balai, qui, le cas échéant, peut se transformer en une arme redoutable !), avait le mérite d'avoir, dans de diverses cultures une charge phallique indubitable que, par exemple, Luc Benoit (1989 : 85) explique comme suit :

Mais l'eau ne suffit pas. Pour féconder la terre il faut la labourer et l'ensemencer. Jadis l'empereur de Chine était même venu rendre le roi du Cambodge, après avoir prié le ciel de leur accorder la pluie, traçait le premier sillon en conduisant la charrue dont le soc pénétrait le champ comme un membre viril, assimilation que l'on retrouve en sanskrit où une même racine désigne la bêche et le phallus.

Symbole de la masculinité dans la littérature

Comme il remarquai la juste raison Gérard Zwang, l'auteur très érudit d'un livre sur l'organe sexuel féminin, « Le phallus, le glorieux organe viril, le Phare masculin, a été étudié, célébré, magnifié à l'envi. » (1997 : 24).

Ainsi, dans l'érologie arabe, dans un dictionnaire trié au 16^e siècle, en Tunisie, par le docteur heikh Umar Ibn Mahomed el-Nehzaoui, on rencontre une série de dénominations métaphoriques spécifiques à l'imaginaire arabe, tels que :

El dekeur, le membre viril ; El forass, le membre chauve ; El kamera, le pénis ; Abou aïne, celui qui avoue un seul œil ; El aïr, le membre pour procréer ; El almar, le poussoir ; El hamama, le pigeon ; El dommar, l'enlève ; El annana, le chausseur ; Abou Rokba, celui qui avoue un œil ; El heurmak, l'indomptable ; Abou queaa, le poilu ; El ahli, le libérateur ; El besiss, l'effronté ; El zeub, le rampeur ; El moschi, le visage ; humilié ; El hammahe, l'exclamatif ; El nasse, le dormeur ; El bekkai, le pleureur ; El zodamme, le pied de biche ; El hezzaz, le fouilleur ; El khiade, le mailleur ; El lezzaz, le syndicaliste ; El khorra, le tournoyeur ; El hakkak, le caoutchouc ; El deukkak, le frappeur ; El mourekhi, le flasque ; El aouame, le nageur ; El mohda, le sauteur ; El dekkal, le voleur ; El mokheuf, le débouleur ; El aouar, le borgne.

Et pour illustrer cette imagination métaphorique du monde arabe, voici l'explication de l'un des mots cités ci-dessus : « Cela s'appelle El hamama (le pigeon), parce qu'après avoir été gonflé hors de proportion, et au moment où il retourne au repos il ressemble à un pigeon se reposant sur ses œufs. » (Ibid. : 105)

Parmi les noms du même organe dans les pièces de Shakespeare – pour nous référer à la littérature européenne d'environ la même période du 16^e siècle – peuvent être rencontrés des termes tels que :

(...) ling, anghovy, tree of life, shule, manhood, arillery, baldpatefriar, glisyring, devil, pinle, yard, jiggumbob, monkey's tail, bodkin, pego, thieling, whimwham, shafda, key, robin, bilbo, steppe, fluke, nutcracker, dalle, maypole, spoon, horn, wand, masquill, outfinger, sword, arriwang and cres

Le caractère macho de l'argot

Il y a toujours des différences entre le langage utilisé par les femmes et celui utilisé par les hommes. En effet, dans certaines sociétés, comme l'a noté Joseph Vendryes, « Les femmes n'emploient pas le même langage que les hommes ; même lorsqu'elles comprennent les mots qu'emploient ceux-ci, elles n'ont jamais le droit de les prononcer. » (1921 : 302)

Robin Tolmachev Lakoff, dans un travail de pionnière dans le domaine sociolinguistique, Language and Woman's Place (Langue et place de la femme), en analysant les différences entre le langage des hommes et celui des femmes, offre une explication intéressante de celles-ci, fondée notamment sur la notion de « politesse » :

The argument most often revolves around the notions of "politeness" we were all taught as children: women's speech differs from men's in that women are more polite, which is precisely as it should be, since women are the preservers of morality and civility; and we speak around women in an especially "polite" way in return, eschewing the coarseness of ruffianly men's language: no slang, no swear words, no off-color remarks.

(L'argument tourne le plus souvent autour de la notion de « politesse » que nous avons tous apprise quand nous étions enfants : le discours des femmes diffère de celui des hommes par le fait que celui des femmes est plus poli, ce qui est précisément comme il se doit, puisque les femmes sont les conservatrices de la morale et de la civilité; et en retour, nous parlons des femmes sur un ton de manière « polie », évitant la grossièreté du langage des hommes : pas d'argot, pas de gros mots, pas de remarques grivoises. (Nous soulignons, LB)

David Szabó aussi, élargissant le périmètre par les différences générales dans l'argot hongrois, note que, bien que l'écart entre les usages masculin et féminin de la langue semble moins prononcé dans les communautés linguistiques en Europe et en Amérique du Nord, par rapport au Japon ou en Chine, « la différence la plus fréquemment observée, et la plus intéressante du point de vue de l'argotologie, est sans doute que les femmes suivent plus fidèlement la norme que les hommes, et qu'elles évitent (ou, du moins, sont censées éviter) plus soigneusement les tabous linguistiques. » (2009 : 314)

Bien qu'il ne partage l'opinion de certains linguistes et argotologues célèbres, selon laquelle les argots seraient des langages exclusivement masculins, Szabó mentionne Marina Yaguello (2002 : 41), spécialiste de la langue féminine qui embrasse toute la théorie, et son compatriote Zoltán Követes, argotologue, qui prétend que les utilisateurs de l'argot seraient majoritairement le même, certains d'entre eux, caractérisés par le machisme et ayant une attitude fondée sur beaucoup de préjugés à l'égard des femmes (2006 : 151).

Mais cette théorie n'est pas nouvelle, car depuis bien avant les premières décennies du 20^e siècle, Olof Jespersen a souligné – au Chapitre XIII, intitulé « La Femme » de son étude monumentale dédiée à la langue – que « the inclination or disinclination to invent and to use slang is undoubtedly one of the 'human secondary sexual characters.' » (1928 / 248) (« l'inclinaison ou la répugnance à inventer et à utiliser l'argot est sans aucun doute l'un des 'traits secondaires sexuels humains' »).

Bien sûr, nous pouvons parler aussi d'exceptions car « Les langues spéciales résultent de la segmentation sociale. » (Vendryes, 1921 / 305), d'où découle que l'argot est également en aïsse de cette segmentation sociale. Ainsi, comme l'a noté Van Genneep, « La constitution, avec le développement actuel de notre civilisation, de toute une catégorie de femmes spéciale, celle des prostituées, a également entraîné la formation d'un argot spécial. » (1908 / 333).

L'existence de cet argot féminin est une caractéristique très particulière et exceptionnelle, car on devrait établir « un distinguo entre le langage des prostituées elles-mêmes et la langue de l'univers de la prostitution, qui inclut les expressions de clients, de souteneurs en général, de malfrats en tout genre, de traîne-patins et de train-putains de tous calibres et de tous acabits. », dans l'opinion de Pierre Merle (2005 / 12), l'auteur averé d'un Dictionnaire de l'argot de la prostitution.

Olof Jespersen remarquait que, sous l'impulsion du mouvement féministe, les femmes ont commencé à imiter les hommes aussi en ce qui concerne leur langage... La tendance s'est poursuivie au cours des décennies suivantes, de sorte qu'aujourd'hui, beaucoup de femmes et jeunes filles utilisent des termes d'argot et même « osent » à utiliser certaines vocabules qui, au moins par les renvois analogiques, appartiennent aux hommes !

Conclusion

L'argot a toujours été un langage masculin, aussi bien par ses créateurs que par ses utilisateurs invérés. Selon nous, ce sont deux traits qui soulignent car atère machiste d'une part la préoccupation obsessionnelle pour la métaphore phallique, le symbole du phallus étant largement et depuis longtemps présent dans l'histoire de l'humanité, d'autre part, l'opinion des argotiers sur la femme (celle-ci étant vue surtout comme objet des plaisirs sexuels et éventuelle source de gains).

Comme nous avons montré, ce caractère phallo-machiste est facilement décelable dans n'importe quel argot. Conséquence ainsi un des quelques traits communs à tous les argots.

Pragmatic Aspects of Epistemic Markers in Business Writing

ABSTRACT

The universe of business is a dynamic environment that often mirrors social realities in relation to market indicators. The language of business, particularly in writing, makes use of a wide range of linguistic markers to capture the reality, desirability, uncertainty and even obscurity of information in such a way as to manipulate the readers in perceiving facts as uncertainties and uncertainties as facts. In this particular respect, our study aims to investigate an array of epistemic markers and opinion markers that are often used in business written discourse in order to express various degrees of certainty or uncertainty, intentional vagueness and hedging.

The examples in our study have been extracted from a set of business articles from The Economist and Financial Times. Additionally, the present paper is concerned with the pragmatic aspects regarding the coded message behind the written message, the linguistic and visual tools employed by business writers in the attempt to guide public thinking in the process of interpreting data about companies, the market customer services etc.

KEYWORDS: epistemic markers, hedging markers, cooperative principle, maxims, locution, illocution, perlocution

English as the global language of business has demonstrated extreme productivity in its use of epistemic markers, which have come to fulfill extremely complex social and discourse functions in communication. It is commonly accepted that modality may be used to communicate at least two distinct types of meanings: epistemic meanings, which deal with the degree of speaker commitment to the truth of the proposition that forms the complement of the modal, and deontic or root modal meanings, concerned with the necessity or possibility of acts performed by morally responsible agents, e.g. obligation and permission (Lyons 1977, Kräzer 1981, 1991, Doae 1983, Palmer 1986, 1990, 2001, Sweetser 1990, Bybee & Fleischmann 1995).

While epistemic utterances deal with the speaker's involvement in the truth of what is being said, conveying just how much (or how little) knowledge he/she possesses in relation to the content of the utterance, deontic utterances encompass the internal forces that compel the speaker to act in a certain manner or to project actions and behaviours onto the interlocutor. An oversimplified view of epistemic utterances would be that they reflect the inner workings of our belief system projected under the form of language, whereas deontic interpretations have the purpose of causing actions and events to happen. In any of the two cases, the employment of grammatical markers (modal verbs, adverbs, tenses etc.) is certainly the most condensed way in which one can communicate efficiently a complexity of thoughts which makes epistemic markers an excellent code within language by means of which speakers and writers hedge their statements in order to protect them against tradition or falsification.

In a particularly close relation to epistemic markers we find the use of hedging as designating a manifestation of language by means of which speakers take precautionary measures to protect themselves from the potential negative effect of their sayings or to protect themselves or their interlocutors from any harm to the reputation of face caused by their utterances.

Lakoff analysed hedges as “words whose meaning implicitly involves fuzziness-words whose job is to make things fuzzier or less fuzzy” (1972: 271) and he discussed words and phrases manifesting hedging power (like rather, very, in a manner of speaking) setting some boundaries in how to interpret linguistic items as hedges. Lakoff also discussed the fact that hedges “interact with felicity conditions for utterances and with rules of conversation” (1972: 213), thus setting the coordinates for interpreting hedges as manifestations conditioned by pragmatic factors. A hedge has later been defined by Brown/Levinson (1978: 145) as:

a particle, word or phrase that modifies the degree of membership of a predicate or a noun phrase in a set; it says of that membership that it is partial or true only in certain respects, or that it is more true and complete than perhaps might be expected.

2. Epistemic markers and hedges in business writing

Starting from the epistemic markers taxonomies forwards by Bailey (1981), Perkins (1983) and Hermerén (1978) and based on a selected corpus of business articles from The Economist and Financial Times we have found that in business writing epistemic markers used as hedging devices include but are not restricted to the following categories:

- Adjectives (possible, probable, hypothetical, uncertain, distant, eventual) used to express uncertainty, doubt, unavailability:

E.g. Buken in America and Britain “normal” rates are a distant prospect. In February Mark Carney, the Bank of England’s governor, promised that eventual rate rises would happen gradually [...]¹

For Britain and America, the prospect of using interest rates to tackle financial imbalances remains hypothetical²

- Nouns conveying a wide range business situations in which vagueness is intentional, knowledge is limited, un-voiced for, debatable or simply unknown (dilemma, trend, issue, question, expectation, projection, risk, indecision)

E.g. Before the meeting the IMF, in an unusually public and explicit fashion, urged the Fed to keep rates near zero for even longer than now planned and to let inflation exceed its target. But the dilemma this creates is well illustrated by the IMF's indecision on the issue. In April it cautioned that "undue delay" in raising interest rates "could lead to a further build-up of financial stability risks".³

Related to this is the question of whether FATF A will pay for itself.⁴

- Modal verbs conveying various degrees of certainty or lack of it (will/would/can/could/may/might/must/ought to)

E.g. Like all revolutions, the one taking place in higher education will have victims. [...] Politicians will inevitably come under pressure to halve this revolution [...] In Britain tuition fees, which were zero two decades ago, can reach £9,000 ($15,000 a year).⁵

Some of the pressure could be eased by higher inflation.⁶

Seizing on better economic conditions to begin preparing for rate rises may seem like good sense.⁷

Falling prices would be a natural outcome of China's frenzied pace of homebuilding.⁸

A rise in the inflation target would not be an easy step to take. The ECB would need permission from its political masters.⁹

- Lexical verbs rendering limited knowledge, presuppositions, personal opinions rather than facts etc. (to seem, to appear, to wonder, to doubt, to presume, to project, to presuppose)

E.g. Look again, however, and the path forward appears similar across the rich world's low interest rates sector off into the visible distance.¹⁰

The argument does not seem to have swayed the Fed's monetary-policy-making committee, which continues to project inflation of almost 2% until the end of 2016.¹¹

- Epistemic adverbs (maybe, perhaps, obviously) and adverbial constructions (no doubt)

E.g. Doubling only the expense for American financial firms, the answer is maybe, if it brings in at least the $800m a year estimated by Congress.¹²

The Fed only established an official target of 2% in January 2012; its officials no doubt worry that so great a change after so little time would undermine its credibility.

- Approximating adverbs, adjectives rendering fuzzy, imprecise values (mostly, almost, approximately, roughly, some, as much as)

E.g. For most students university remains a great deal; by one count the boost in lifetime income from obtaining a college degree, in net present value terms, is as much as $590,000. But for an increasing number of students who have gone deep in debt—especially the 47% in America and 28% in Britain who do not complete their course—it is plainly not a value for money.¹³

More than 77,000 financial firms have signed up. About 80 countries have struck agreements with America to allow their banks to hand over data.¹⁴

- Articles (the, a, some, any) when clearly contributing to assigning a degree of uncertainty by referring to only one member of an entire category

E.g. One provider, Coursera, claims over 8m registered users. Though its courses are free, it lagged its rivals $1m in revenues last year after introducing the option to pay a fee of between $30 and $100 to have course results certified¹⁵

And other analysts paint a darker picture, pointing out Nomura, a bank, which believes that properly now poses a systemic risk to China's economy.¹⁶

- Particles (if, unless, though, but, ...) introducing a condition, a contradiction to a previous statement

E.g. Unless countries come together to take the right kind of policy measures, we could be facing years of slow and subpar growth – well below the solid, sustainable growth that is needed to create enough jobs and improve living standards in the future.¹⁷

A Riksbank staff study contradicts Mr Svensson's findings, concluding that his lower rates, if perceived to be long-lasting will in fact raise debt ratios.

- Tense (preterite or marked forms) when the speaker judgmentally makes reference to a state of affairs which has been invalidated, made untrue

E.g. UNTIL the global financial crisis, central banks treated bubbles with benign neglect they were hard to detect and harder to deflate, so best left alone; the mess could be mopped up after they burst¹⁸

The IMF warnings did little to damp bullish stock markets which took succor from an ADP report that put private sector job creation at 91,000 in March. Although the number was slightly less than forecast, it is one of the first signs that economic weakness in the labour market was a result of wintry weather rather than anything more structural. Markets are now focused on tomorrow's payroll report for evidence that the world's largest economy is gaining strength¹⁹

- The progressive aspect (marked forms) when used to render a temporary state of affairs that is soon to become invalid, a transitory situation which raises concern?

E.g. Central banks around the world are struggling to promote growth without fomenting worrisome risk-taking²⁰

The global economy is turning the corner of the Great Recession, although overall growth remains too slow and weak, Ms Lagarde said.²¹

- Emphatic DO constructions to convey certainty or to meet expectations, to confirm predictions etc?

E.g. Property prices did peak in 2011, as the Journal noted. But the following year, they started to rise again.²²

- Reporting information with verba dicendi (to say, to utter, to hint, to suggest, to declare, to claim etc)

E.g. The biggest shareholder of Zhejiang Xingrun, a property firm, was recently detained for “illegal fund-raising”, local reports say.²³

Markets reckon prices will rise even more slowly²⁴

On June 12th the Bank of England hinted it would pursue new measures to curb ever-rising property prices.²⁵

FATF will penetrate some of the shell companies and other structures they hide behind, but Senate investigators and other experts say loopholes remain.²⁶

Moreover, Fed officials have recently hinted that they would prefer to let inflation rise above 2% briefly than strangle the recovery with premature tightening.²⁷

However, Christine Lagarde, managing director of the IMF, warned of several obstacles to a sustained recovery including job-killing “low-inflation” in the eurozone and geopolitical tensions stemming from the crisis in Ukraine. She said the prospects of faster growth depended on more investment and structural reforms in labour and product markets.²⁸

- Passive constructions display a hedging effect by the fact that they conceal the agent and they display a hearsay component that reduces voicing ability on the part of the writer?

E.g. For China’s property tycooness, things are the other way round: their dire predictions are often believed, but have yet to prove true.²⁹

Nonetheless, a rate cut is widely expected next month.³⁰

- Closed yes/no questions of form in the formal usage do convey doubt (E.g. Is the market ready for such events?)

E.g. CAN bubbles ever pop twice?³¹

But is “N = All” really a good description of most of the found data sets we are considering? Probably not³²

- Likelihoods/ negative constructions which convey a rhetorical undercurrent purposefully do make hedged generalizations

E.g. No self-respecting central bank admits benign neglect any longer. “No one wants to live through another financial crisis,” Janet Yellen, then a candidate to head the Federal Reserve, said last year. “I would not rule out using monetary policy as a tool to address asset-price misalignments”³³

- Discourse linkers conveying partial or total contradiction with the idea mentioned before, thus assigning a degree of epistemic doubt to the context (in fact, however, although, nonetheless, nevertheless)

E.g. Related to this is the question of whether FATF A will pay for itself. Doing only the expense for American financial firms, the answer is maybe, if it brings in at least the $800m a year estimated by Congress. [...] However, the overall costs of complying, borne mostly by non-American banks, are likely to far exceed the extra tax receipts.³⁴

A Riksbank staff study contradicts Mr Svensson’s findings, concluding that this lower rate, if perceived to be long-lasting, would in fact raise debt ratios. Nonetheless, a rate cut is widely expected next month.

3. The Cooperative Principle: Grice’s Conversational Maxims

At the core of any analysis of speech acts stands the hypothesis that the production of a speech act is a form of social interaction (Lyons, 1977: 725). In other words, humans produce utterances with a definite purpose in mind, which will eventually function as a form of social interaction: receiving a response from an interlocutor, causing an interlocutor to perform a certain action as a result of being exposed to some information.

The essential assumption people make when speaking to one another is that all the participants in a conversational exchange are trying to cooperate with one another to construct meaningful conversations. This assumption is referred to as the Cooperative Principle. As stated in H. P. Grice’s Logic and Conversation (1975: 41-58): “Make your conversational contribution such as is required, at the stage at which it occurs, by the accepted purpose or direction of the talk exchange in which you are engaged.”

As a result of this underlying principle, people engaged in information exchanges often overlook various types of errors that occur in their partner’s discourse as their primary focus is on understanding the overall message. A second effect of this essential principle of pragmatics is that when exchanges are spiced up with metaphors, sarcasm, indirectness, interlocutors are still able to grasp meaning based on the assumption that they will be focusing on extracting meaningful content from ambiguous form.

Grice further refined the cooperation principle into a set of conversational maxims aimed at establishing absolute rules that should ideally govern any informational exchange. These rules are meant to provide guidance and orientation for speakers in their attempt to optimize the informational content of their utterances within minimal form and avoid ambiguity, indirectness, metaphor etc.

Thus, the Maxim of Quantity encourages speakers to make their contributions as informative as required (i.e. not to say too much or too little and to make the strongest statements they can in terms of content). The Maxim of Quality postulates not to say what one believes to be false or for which one lacks adequate evidence. The Maxim of Relation emphasizes the importance of being relevant and on topic, whereas the maxim of manner has to do with avoiding ambiguity, obscurity, focusing on being brief and orderly.

Despite the criticism which arose naturally against the formulation of the maxims, pragmatic interpretations rely heavily on Grice's theory. As Bath (2005) puts it, these maxims address the inner workings of informational exchange with both speakers and listeners well aware of:

... [W]e need first to get a clear on the character of Grice's maxims. They are not sociological generalizations about speech, nor they are moral prescriptions or proscriptives on what to say or communicate. Although Grice presented them in the form of guidelines for how to communicate successfully, I think they are better construed as presumptions about utterances, presumptions that we as listeners rely on and as speakers exploit.

However, it was not Grice's assumption that all people should conscientiously follow these maxims. Quite on the contrary, he found it even more challenging when the maxims were not respected, namely "flouted" (with the listener being expected to be able to understand the message) or "violated" (with the listener being expected to not know this). Flouting a maxim, therefore, refers to conveying a different, a hidden meaning. The importance was in what was not said. For instance, answering It's cold in here to someone who has suggested opening the window only disrespects the maxim of relation on the surface; the logic behind this response is normally clear to the interlocutor (i.e. Don't open the window!), therefore the maxim is merely flouted.

Flouting a maxim is a technique speakers and writers often employ in order to create a conversational implicature. This occurs when, by clearly and obviously violating a maxim, one can imply something beyond what one says. As we shall see in the examples we have analyzed below, flouting maxims to create implicatures can be a powerful and creative tool to get a point across to readers. Moreover, business writers often resort to flouting maxims in the attempt to form an opinion in the reader, to present a business phenomenon from opposite angles, to attract reader's attention and keep it, to generate creative interpretations of language etc. Moreover, we shall analyze the manner in which epistemic markers are often called upon to generate implicatures while flouting the cooperation maxims.

4. Epistemic markers, epistemic visuals and flouting of the maxims in business writing

The formulation of facts in business articles, as in the case of any information exchange, is fully dependent on two pragmatic parameters: the communicative purpose and the specialized readership.

As far as the communicative purpose is concerned, business literature covers various functions: to report on economic trends, to analyze market indicators, to inform the reader about various business events; to analyze a business phenomenon, to emphasize relations between various existing or developing realities, technologies, markets etc. The adequacy of information content and of writing style is adjusted according to the second pragmatic parameter, i.e. the intended audience. Not only essential information is conveyed to the peer-experts as both writer(s) and reader(s) share some common conceptual knowledge.

Additionally, style should adapt to the genre conventions for a business article in order to abide by the Gricean cooperative principle (Grice, 1975: 45-47) with its four maxims of quality, quantity, manner and relevance. In this respect, cohesive markers play a vital role to achieve a natural progression from facts to interpretations, from numbers to their meanings, from trends to their related effects.

According to the theory of relevance in communication (Wilson & Sperber, 1998), writers should always consider their readers' capacity of understanding a text and their previous conceptual background knowledge, ability to relate to the informational content of the written text should facilitate the readers' inferences and pre-suppositions for the correct interpretation of the text and arouse their interest in deciphering the content beyond the form:

[...] the speaker, by the very act of addressing someone, communicates that her utterance is the most relevant one compatible with her abilities and preferences, and is at least relevant enough to be worth his processing effort

Notably, in the corpus articles, discourse connectors such as "however", "although", "but", and "therefore" signal the introduction of a problem, a sense of epistemic doubt, an information gap that must be addressed, further investigated or a source of ambiguity. Similarly, an evaluation of lexical and grammatical strategies for conveying knowledge or lack of it provides readers with obvious textual clues to distinguish between what is fact and what is a mere authorial interpretation of incomplete facts. Lexical references to particular business issues obviously involve a number of negative connotations in the sense that some epistemic markers with the help of which the maxims are flouted are, in fact, manipulative strategies, as the following selected examples will demonstrate.

Even in the case of an epistemically modalized utterance, which, in essence focuses on conveying the degree of knowledge possessed by the speaker in saying X sentence, the speaker is still attempting to obtain an active response on the part of the interlocutor by deeming an event or a state of affairs possible, certain, improbable and by encouraging the interlocutor to form an opinion and have a reaction to the stated possibility, probability etc.

Example 1 below, taken from The Economist (March 22nd 2014, Hong-Kong printed edition) encourages the reader to answer the question initialized by a capitalized can: “CAN bubbles ever pop twice?” after exposing the reader to a hedged statement: “China’s property prices appear to be falling again.” The capitalization of CAN deepens the idea of doubt in the likelihood of the event described in the sentence, thus increasing the hedging power of the modal in the rhetorical question. The maxim of manner is flouted by the writer’s failing to avoid ambiguity together with the maxim of quality by saying something for which evidence is withheld.

Example 1. The Economist (March 22nd 2014)

CAN bubbles ever pop twice? In late 2009 the world began to worry about a Chinese property bubble, symbolised by Ordos, a newly built city, bereft of citizens, in Inner Mongolia. In the spring of 2010 China’s government broadened its curbs on multiple home purchases and mortgage borrowing. The following spring, prices in nine big cities fell at last according to one widely watched index. “The Great Property Bubble Of China May Be Popping” declared the Wall Street Journal in June of that year. This week the same newspaper said “compelling signs the Chinese property boom is over,” noting that “assessments” have been predicting a crash for years.³⁵

Moreover, the interpretation of the message relies heavily on deciphering the ambiguity of the form and of the visual aids. The author introduces the information about the trend in Chinese real estate by employing a suite of epistemic markers that firstly announce a reality that there is double bubble trouble, and then reduces certainty by using the epistemic marker appear, followed by the rhetorical question CAN bubbles ever pop twice? These epistemic tools are used to formulate authorial opinions but also to allow the reader to form an opinion and perhaps create a response in the form of an answer to the situation depicted in the article's symbolic Chinese property bubble that has been growing lately and is perhaps preparing for a second crash in prices. Therefore, the maxim of quantity is also flouted as the text abounds in fuzzy elements that are not a necessary part of the informational content rendered.

Moreover, the symbolism of the picture accompanying the article contributes to its interpretation in terms of epistemic doubt as the image of the skyscrapers is surrounded by fog/smog which further deepens the interpretation of the message as a warning that the future is gloomy in Chinese real estate. Consequently, it is possible to detect extralinguistic features of discourse in the form of visual information which contribute to the epistemically hedged interpretation of the linguistic content of the article. Business writing makes extensive usage of such tools and devices to enrich the imagery and suggestiveness of business articles, thus leading the way to understanding business writing as an art form.

As far as business writing is concerned, we are in fact living a cultural phenomenon manifested by conventions to increase abstractness, vagueness and hedging through business writings that attempt to manipulate people into particular beliefs while not interfering with their system of free will in forming a personal opinion. In this regard, epistemic markers and hedging devices play a key role.

Example 2 below is taken from Financial Times (March 28th 2014) and it also reflects a high level of vagueness in formulating informational content blended with straightforward opinion formulation aimed at leading readers into deciding whether BIG DATA is a viable option for modern consumer society.

The author raises a question in the title which the article presumably attempts to answer, and yet the presumably objective analysis is biased by a set of markers aimed at suggesting the author's standpoint and the opinion he wishes to form in his readers.

Example 2. Financial Times (March 28th 2014)

Big data: are we making a big mistake?

By Tim Harford

Big data is a vague term for a massive phenomenon that has rapidly become an obsession with entrepreneurs, scientists, governments and the media. [...]

Cheerleaders for big data have made four exciting claims, each one reflected in the success of Google Flu Trends: that data analysis produces unfanily accurate results; that every single data point can be captured, making old statistical sampling techniques obsolete that is passé; that we know what causes what, because statistical correlation tells us what we need to know; and that statistical models aren't needed because, to quote “The End of Theory”, a provocative essay published in Wired in 2008, “with enough data, the numbers speak for themselves”.

©Ed Nafon

Unfortunately, these four articles of faith are at best optimistic oversimplifications. At worst, according to David Spiegelhalter, Winston Professor of the Public Understanding of Risk at Cambridge University, they can be “complete bollocks. Absolute nonsense.”³⁶

The hedges that the author employs in this article excerpt are not grammatical in nature but rather rely on linguistic conventions to render authorial views. He flouts the maxims of quality and manner by resorting to irony, but also to strong, offensive words to investigate the phenomenon depicted in the article, but avoids formulating a straightforward view and prefers to report (a hedging device in itself) the opinions of respected professionals that are against the idea in contrast with the claims (a hedging device on the more) of cheerleaders for big data.

The mere fact that the author prefers to conceal the identities of the supporters of Big data is in itself a risk when they are represented by the term cheerleaders (as in shallow, not to be taken seriously type of people) in contrast to David Spiegelhalter, Winston Professor of the Public Understanding of Risk at Cambridge University (full name and position) who supports the view that big data is bollocks and nonsense, in full accordance with the author's own view. In Gricean terms, the author's contribution is informative with respect to the details which serve his purpose and is ambiguous and obscure in the opposite situation, thus violating the maxims of quantity and manner.

The symbolism of the picture using binary coding to form the image of skyscrapers further deepens the idea that modern society relies heavily and perhaps excessively on computer generated and computer manipulated data.

Austin's theory of Speech Acts (1962) revolutionized language study by focusing on the relation between words and thoughts and, even more challengingly, between words and deeds, or, as Austin himself puts it, how to do things with words. The term speech act has generated some paradoxical implications since it does not refer to oral communication only but also to a more abstract understanding of what language is and what it is used for in terms of social interaction between users.

Austin's theory analyses any speech activity under three key aspects:

- The locutionary act, represented by the act of producing grammatically recognizable utterances:

the utterance of certain noises, the utterance of certain words in a certain construction, and the utterance of them with a certain „meaning” in the favourite philosophical sense of the word, i.e. with a certain sense and a certain reference

The locutionary act can thus be understood as the actual form of a communication endowed with a charge of meaning. Even in the case of evidential or epistemic markers being present in utterances, the locution refers to the production of the utterance, not to the literal or abstract content of the information embedded in the utterance.

- The illocutionary act – refers to the actual content of the utterance, what the speaker is doing by uttering a certain sentence, for instance he/she is promising, ordering, demanding, asking, threatening etc. For instance, the locutionary act in Give me some money corresponds to the illocution to ask.

In epistemically modalized statements, the illocutionary act can be difficult to identify because of the high degree of indirectness rendered by epistemic elements. They hedge statements so well that they often dilute the illocution to a state of beyond recognition. For instance, the following statement, though modalized with epistemic elements, does not express the speaker's opinion or knowledge about the world but rather it has the illocutionary force of a recommendation?

Or, as Austin himself put it:

... saying something will often, or even normally, produce certain thoughts or action of the audience, or of the speaker, or of other person? we may then say that the speaker has performed an act in the nomenclature of a perlocutionary act and the act performed a perlocution

Perlocutionary acts, finally, are defined by the reaction of the interlocutor to the meaning of the utterance and may or may not be in agreement with the intended illocutionary act. For example, the illocution of recommending an increase in inflation in an utterance such as Some of the pressure could be eased by higher inflation, may result in the perlocution a) The banks increased inflation or b) The banks refused to reduce inflation.

In the case of epistemic modality manifested in utterances, interpretations of illocutions can be misleading in the sense that epistemic modal elements can occur as hedging elements in utterances meant to soften or to sweeten an intended illocutionary act. Lyons (1977: 730) noted that Austin's discussion of illocutions and perlocutions has often been challenged in semantics and the theory according to which conveying information from x to y is aimed at making y aware of something unknown was deemed insufficient because this approach does not cover all the instances of communication.

Another important observation is that with epistemic modals rendering indirectness, tentativeness etc., the desired perlocutionary effect may differ from the obtained perlocutionary effect and the interlocutor should be able to admit that a certain illocutionary act has taken place and identify the illocution in order to act in accordance with it (Lyons, 1977: 731).

An example of speakers using locutions that differ from the illocution and result in various perlocutions is taken from The Economist (March 29th issue) and it relies on an assembly of organized subtitle – subtitle – visual message, which starts from the subtitle Up, up and away, leading readers into believing in economic growth.

Example 3. The Economist (March 29th 2014)

Up, up and away

Higher inflation may be needed to leave ex-low inflation rates and behind

AT FIRST glance, rich-world central banks are going their separate ways. Deterred by sturdy growth figures, the Bank of England and the Federal Reserve are shuffling toward an exit from easy monetary policy; markets found Jane Yellen's first Fed statement unexpectedly hawkish. The European Central Bank, in contrast, is backing looser. On March 25th Jens Weidmann, president of the Bundesbank, suggested that the ECB might need to be more forceful in order to keep the euro-area economy out of the grips of deflation.³⁷

The author then ironically contradicts the initial illocution and violates the quality maxim by providing the image of the strangled balloon to indicate that the economy is taking off but is conditioned by a tightening of the belt. The epistemic modal markers used in the high key may be needed delivers additional ambiguity by assigning a high degree of uncertainty to the measures of increasing inflation and increasing interest rates so that consumers may understand that these are the sacrifices they MUST make (as the decoding of may be needed) in order to help economic growth.

Example 3 above also contains what the author would have us believe is a report of what Jens Weidmann uttered on March 25th or it may just as well be the author's interpretation of what should be done in order to keep the euro area economy stable. This example relates to the difficulty of interpreting the precise illocution as the author a) conveys the illocution deliberately in order to add depth to the claim by letting the reader make sense of the purpose of the Jens Weidmann statement or b) uses might need to soften the strength of the FORCE in the original utterance of Jens Weidmann to render it more diplomatically as an economically permanent measure.

In determining illocutionary force, one should take into account conventions according to Austin (1962), i.e. mental patterns in the way people think in particular social and cultural contexts, which Strawson (1964) and Grice (1989) dismissed under the assumption that primary illocutionary acts (assertions, questions, commands) are essentially non-conventional since they can be accounted for by means of the response and by the spontaneous reaction demonstrating recipient recognition of the communicative intention. For instance, the example above can generate a range of perlocutionary effects that are by no means conventional in nature and that may or may not observe the author's original intention. The reader may interpret the example above as a warning about gloomy days, a recommendation of how to organize their finances etc.

Moreover, even when people recognize communicative intention, their reaction is often essentially different from authorial expectations, for instance react to the information in example 3 above with total distrust in the author's negativity/pessimism regarding economic future and produce irrational spending sprees as a reaction.

5. Conclusions

What the current study is indicating in terms of usage of epistemic markers and hedging devices is that business discourse is becoming increasingly coded and readers require increasing perspicacity in detecting hidden meanings and maximizing lexical/visual metaphor decoding. Additionally, business authors are developing a set of strategies in the attempt to guide public opinion in a particular direction while maintaining the illusion they are not interfering with the reader's free will system in formulating personal views. Hedging devices cover a wide array of manifestations in business discourse and are particularly interesting in their power to convey vagueness and unwillingness to vouch for the truthfulness of an assertion, thus becoming an essential tool in flouting or violating the Gricean maxims within the framework of the cooperative principle.

What we found particularly interesting to investigate was whether epistemic and hedging markers take precedence over straightforward formulations which should, presumably characterize business discourse, a discourse of facts and figures rather than of opinions. Surprisingly, business discourse is no longer about facts and figures but rather about metaphorically encoded opinions about facts, figures and trends. Moreover, business writing has developed an integrated approach to persuasive discourse, using powerful imagery to complement manipulative goals (and we use manipulative in the most benign possible way) in contributing to the formation of public opinion.

The Polysemy of Romanian Words and their Receiving by Foreign Students

ABSTRACT

Referring to the phenomenon of polysemy in terminology for the students who want to learn Romanian as a foreign language is rather problematic. The changes in language, the lexical novelty from different domains reflect in actual linguistic reality. The terminological polysemy is a natural phenomenon in the evolution of a live language, though it may contribute to a certain weighing of receiving the language specific to the domain of interest for the one who studies Romanian as a foreign language. In this case the disambiguation of the context is very important, offering as many clues as possible on the domain of origin through other specialized terms. The terms of a certain domain, after reaching to levels of common language at an earlier stage, are reintroduced in the specialized communication, being taken over by other domains than the original one. As general language tends to incorporate more terms, the exclusively considered and specialized tend to de-specialize, and as the vocabulary grows, both specialists in other domains and common language speakers start gaining access to it. Thus, the importance of deciphering the sense of polysemant words by the foreign students eager to learn Romanian, is natural.

1. Introduction

Part of semantics along with homonymy, synonymy, antonymy, paronymy, etc., polysemy (< Greek "polis" – "several", "séma" – "sign, sense") is a characteristic of terms belonging to natural languages of having several senses depending on the context. It is considered a fundamental and universal semantic category because it appears in any language, being "a law of developing and functioning of the human language" (Budeanu, 1996: 60).

Around 80% of the main fund of actual languages, according to statistics, is made of polysemant words (the number varies from one language to another). In Romanian 85% of the words in the active vocabulary are polysemant, the rest of 15% being mono-semant. Polysemy is mainly characteristic to verbs, nouns and adjectives and is directly proportional to the age of the word and its frequency of use in the language.

∇nsequently, in linguistic analysis, the disambiguation of polysemantic terms is done by delimiting the specific contexts and by detecting the common and secondary senses, with a more or less figurative meaning, from them. Besides, “dealing with polysemy in different specialty works was done from different perspectives: diachronic (the evolution in time of the senses of certain words) or synchronic (the relationships between the senses of a certain word in a given period)” (Bidu-Vrăncianu & Forăscu, 1988: 39). One of the most important things in polysemy is to determine the relationships between the sense of a word through “visible” elements and the precise delimitation, especially through contexts, of the differences between them.

2. Polysemantic words and their contextual senses

Polysemy is considered to be an almost general trait of words, because the absolute majority of the words that belong to the active vocabulary are polysemantic. This means that most of the words, as designations of the elements from the extra linguistic reality, prove able to cover several meanings. As specialty works underline, polysemy must be considered a rule, while monosemy – more of an exception.

There is a direct report between the polysemantic character of a word and the contexts in which it is used. Polysemantic words are generally used in several contexts. Thus, the more a word is frequently used, the more senses it will have. So, the polysemantic word will allow as many contexts as senses included in its semantic structure and it will be harder to learn for those who wish to learn Romanian as a foreign language. Usually, the difficulty occurs in the case of mixed groups who learn Romanian as a foreign language, namely in the case of specialty terminology belonging to medicine, engineering, IT, philology, economists, law, etc., when the same term is found in different domains with stylistically and contextually specialized senses.

For example, the noun memorie (DEX, 1996: 619) [memory] is registered in Romanian dictionaries with the following senses: 1. “ținere de minte” (to have a good memory); 2. “amintire” (to keep an event in mind); 3. “amintire păstrată de posteritate pentru oamenii iluștri” (to honor the memory of heroes); 4. “parte componentă a calculatorului” (software information in the memory of the computer); 5. “minte” (resident of the memory process). ∇nsequently, we will be able to use this word in the contexts: 1. In any situation we need a good memory. 2. I have kept in my mind for a long time the teacher’s words. 3. Our duty is to honor the memory of the heroes fallen on duty. 4. The memory of the computer should be changed. 5. “A healthy mind in a healthy body”. At the same time, it is still the context that ensures the differentiation of the senses of the polysemantic word in speech that is why we often remember the sense of a word by reporting to the context.

Another example, the noun impuls (DEX, 1996: 479) [impulse], with rather big differences between senses, is met in contexts related to physiology and physics, designating: 1. “an urge, a nervous stimulus, oriented towards the execution of an order” – In his job as a prosecutor, solving the case constituted a strong impulse to promotion; 2. “a physical measure, delimited according to determined conditions” - The impulse of a body is a physical measure defined as the product of mass and speed; 3. “sudden, intense and short-term variation of a variable measure” - The electric impulse is the short-term emission of electricity.

The polysemantic words have a very complex semantic structure. The whole of the senses of the polysemantic word forms its semantic structure. Within this structure the senses connect by different relationships. Usually, what unifies the senses of a polysemantic word is the existence of some common semantic components. For example, each of the senses of the polysemantic word a destrăma (Țonșaninescu, 2001: 82) [to unravel, to crumble, to dissipate, etc.] - 1. to unravel a fabric; 2. to unwind a ball of thread; 3. to decompose, to take apart in decomposing elements; 4. to end - contains the common signification of deteriorating a whole until its cancellation. And in the case of the verb a devora [to devour] with the senses - 1. to eat greedily (The wolf devoured the lamb); 2. to consume, to destroy, to burn up (The fire devoured the house). 3. to devour a book, to read feverishly (He devoured the book to the last pages) - the common component that unifies its three senses is that of consuming until the end.

In order to explain the different senses of the polysemantic words to those who learn Romanian as a foreign language, it is very important to verify the differences between senses by replacement with different synonyms specialized in contexts. For example, the polysemy of the adjective limpede (Bidu-Vrănceanu & Forăscu, 1988: 48) [clear] is a rich one, having as connective of senses the meaning of “lacking impurities”, of “clarity”, of “transparency”. Thus, one may say liquids are clear, the sky or the atmosphere is clear, the eyes, the look or the voice are clear, the mind and the expression may also be clear. The strict differentiation of senses forces to take into consideration the contexts, just for a better understanding of the signification of the word but also for an adequate use of the latter in the future: “The principle of the semantic and contextual disambiguation starts from the practical necessity to differentiate the senses of polysemantic words, especially if the senses are very numerous or can generate confusions in communication” (Bidu-Vrănceanu, 1986: 66).

Polysemy as a phenomenon that characterizes the words of the language also the main stage of its evolution explains itself from a historical point of view. The sources of polysemy are the sense slides, the figurative expressions and the influence of foreign words. Though, the main cause of polysemy is the semantic evolution of words. Polysemy is due to the modifications of sense that words suffer as a result of their usage in different contexts. Through frequent use in new contexts the words can gain new senses along with the original one.

The semantic enrichment of words are also based on the associations speakers make between different surrounding objects. For instance, to the basic sense of the word aripă (DEX, 1996: 59) [wing] “forelimb of birds, of insects or of mammals that serves for flight” were added the following senses (“fin”, “membrane of certain fruits or seeds”, “parts of certain devices”, “blade of a water mill”) as a consequence of the association made by speakers between the shape, the function or the position of wings and the new entities that began to be designated by this word. Another two senses (“side of a building”, “end, flank of a group in battle formation”) were attributed to this word due to the birds’ wing and the other entities, based on their position.

The adjective puternic (DEX, 1996: 875) [strong] is used in language with the following senses: 1. “strong, vigorous” (strong man); 2. “it outputs a large amount of power” (strong/powerful engine); 3. “intense” (strong wind); 4. “loud” (loud voice); 5. live, intense (strong light); 6. influential (powerful stake); 7. figurative – “solid” (solid argument).

The word pământ (Budeanu, 1996: 60) [earth] also has in Romanian the following senses: 1. “the plane we live on” – Earth is a plane just like Jupiter; 2. “earth crust” – A snowdrop sprang from the earth; 3. “stretch of land” – The salvation of the shipwreck was a stretch of land; 4. “cultivable soil” – He had inherited a large piece of land; 6. “the matter that composes the solid part of the plane” – Planets grow in the earth; 7. “territory, region, country” – The wedding ceremony took place according to the local habits. In this case polysemy also appears at the level of locutions and expressions:

- “very far” – la capătul pământului (at the end of the earth/world);
- “forever” – de când e lumea și pământul (since the beginning of time);
- “big difference” – ca de la cer la pământ.

Thus, any exercise of explaining the senses of a polysemant word to foreign students who want to learn Romanian is an occasion for the latter to assimilate the vocabulary, to exactify in their own semantic relations what each respective word has in language.

A certain exactness in knowing the senses of a polysemant word intervenes when we talk about abstract words, because they say that “abstract words are generally monosemant words, an aspect that should increasingly manifest in Romanian, especially in the case of the fairly numerous neologisms that exist in this class – and given that (...) regarding abstract words it seems that secondary senses express slides in the same semantic sphere (...) that would limit, on principle, polysemy” (Bidu-Vrănceanu, 2000: 28). However, we are talking about polysemy in the case of certain neologisms (abstract words) such as repulsion, hostility, affection, etc. The abstract word repulsie (Ibidem: 31) [repulsion] has the primary sense of “feeling of aversion”, later to be found in physics meaning “tendency of separation”. The polysemy of the word affection seems to be more explicitly delimited by the senses, a positive one – “a tender feeling for someone”, another one negative, used in medicine – “pathological state of an organ”. There is a clear polysemy of Romanian neologisms (abstract words), they may be possibly more in a larger proportion than the monosemant words, somehow limited to the scientific language.

3. Conclusions

When we wish to understand the meaning of a polysemant word without major errors, we must place the word in a context because, taken outside the text the term would be but a lifeless element. The term should be studied “in its natural environment” (Béjoint & Thoiron, 2000: 16).

Usually a word with a high level of specialization tends to precision, confinement and a systematic character. The terms that appear here have tendency towards monosemy and sole senses. As the degree of specialization decreases, the distance acquires the characteristics of the unspecialized distance. From a polysemantic point of view, terms are regarded by most linguists as dynamic units, a capacity that expresses the mobility of the units from the specialized vocabulary to the common one and vice versa, as well as from a specialized domain to another. Thus one underlines the terminological variation in texts and the expansion of polysemy as domains intersect, as one could observe in the multi-disciplinary works (Ibidem: 14). Regarding the relationship with Romanian, one considers that the transfer of the terms in texts and contexts of broad usage induce a process of de-terminologisation, a different degrees, of the specialized sense, the term being able to gain, along its denotative dimension, a connotative dimension (reaching a proper polysemy) (Bidu-Vrăncianu, 2007: 28).

This is why the way of approaching specialized texts addressed to foreign students is very important because the receiving of terminology with polysemantic alterations can cause confusion among them. Particularly, the metaphorical senses of certain terms often encountered in the common language may be difficult to understand by the ones willing to learn Romanian. For this reason one emphasizes the explanation of the basic sense of the newly distanced term and subsequently the amplification of the secondary senses it may have and its placing in different contexts.

The linguist Alice Toma (2005: 100-101) considers the polysemy of terms is assured by migrations from one domain of knowledge to another, even if she admits that the semantic diversification does not only know polysemanticism, while keeping certain semantic links between the different senses, but also homonymy, while locally breaking the semantic relationships or by adding some senses that have nothing in common with the former ones, using as an example the word articulation 1. (as a term in morphology, put in a semantic relationship with the article); 2. (the phonetic term referring to the way and the basis of articulation of a language) and the word subject 1. (in syntax); 2. (in psychology) between which there is no relationship of sense. Sometimes, the signification of a specialized term can be distanced only in the large context of a good knowledge of the respective domain and the line of separation between polysemy and homonymy can be a thin one and very difficult to observe for someone who does not know Romanian.

For foreign students who study Romanian, "the typical case of an ambiguity (accomplished at a lexical level through polysemy, homonymy, etc.) that allows the substitution of a predictable interpretation with another, a surprising one" (Zafiu, 2001: 258), is a less productive one.

Valences and Limits of Interlinguistic Communication

ABSTRACT

A cautious evaluation of the epistemological referent leads to the conclusion that interlinguism is recognized as a given reality, as a phenomenon that takes place at the crossroad of cultures, without being a purpose in itself. Yet the conceptual realization of this phenomenon has not been completely defined yet. The theoretical reflection on this issue, which can become a goal in cases that generate conflicts, marginalization, discrimination, racism or aggressive assertion of cultural superiority has a sporadic and unsystematic character, as the area of research must be extended to a multitude of disciplines. Learning a foreign language substantially contributes to the individual evolution on an ascending trajectory by gradually enhancing the intellectual apparatus, by taking interest in the arts, moral and social values of other cultures and by adopting balance, tolerance and empathy. The contact with the values of other cultures implies the permanent reference to one's own community identity, the evaluation of common and different axiological aspects and the consolidation of the human spirit with the values of both cultures.

Interculturality implies the combination of community identity and availability towards other cultures. It has a large range of diversity, from the translation of a text from another language, seeing films, visiting museums, organizing trips abroad or meeting people of different cultures.

A cautious evaluation of the epistemological referent would lead to the conclusion that interlinguism is acknowledged as given reality. It is a phenomenon that takes place at the junction of cultures, without being a purpose in itself. Yet its conceptual realization is not conclusive. The theoretical reflection on the issue on debate, which can become a goal in cases that might seem to conflict, marginalization, discrimination, racism or aggressive assertion of cultural superiority, has a sporadic and desultory character. This is the reason why the area of research must be extended to a multitude of human-related disciplines. Anthropology, political economists, psychology and sociology, as sciences of the human spirit, as historical sciences, which are in fact sciences of culture, deliver valuable information which can contribute to the patterning of a valid conception of interlinguism. This process is possible although the above mentioned sciences are neither the expression of a common point of view, nor have they realized a distinct, rigorous and intrinsic methodology.

Talking about the interlinguism whose goal is a good understanding among individuals cannot be considered utopia. In fact, interlinguism deals with perspective and depth, with the ability to lead and adapt to conditions in which the cultural diversity has become part of our daily existence, therefore it cannot be ignored. The exponential expansion of communication in the contemporary society and the improvement of the means of transportation that allow the individual to keep permanent contact with the exterior world seem to offer pleasantly to fill with the empirical content of Soma-Barth's formula according to which the man is a social being. Now more than ever, the social subject gains richness from his social perspective, depending on time, place and community affiliation. Within the framework of this complex reality lies the researcher's task to conceptualize, adapting to a reality that is in a permanent process of transformation.

A coherent approach on interlinguism must use as a starting point the representation of the phenomenon as a crossroad of different cultures, which transfer concepts pluridimensionally. This means that the very foundation of the understanding among humans lies the language, as a way of representation.

A fundamental goal in the intercultural preparation in a formal sense is the driving of the individual into the epilogue of self-development. This goal can be achieved by the inversion of the necessity to acquire interlinguistic competence, achievable by the intense and solid study of the European languages.

Learning a foreign language substantially contributes to the evolution of the man on an ascending trajectory by gradually widening the intellectual apparatus, by taking interest in the artistic, moral and cultural values of other cultures and by adopting balance, tolerance, empathy and humanism. The contact with the values of other cultures implies the permanent reference to one's own community identity, the evaluation of common and different axiological aspects and the consolidation of the human spirit with the values of both cultures.

A hypothesis for the tempering of a conflict in intercultural context for cooperation and reach of the plenitude of community life should start from the postulate according to which language is essential for a culture and for the understanding of a culture. A unitary epistemological foundation for this hypothesis can be identified in the appeal to anthropology and linguistics. Nations have their own means of referring to reality, materialized in lexical, syntactic and phraseological differences. Language, in terms of structural linguistics, uses symbols or denotations of things, as it is a representation of the sensible world, of the surrounding reality. In his so-called hypothesis, Benjamin Lee Whorf, Eduard Sapir's disciple, asserted that language is in a relationship of causality with the system of representation of the world, being first of all, a classification and an arrangement of the stream of the sensory experience which results in a certain world-order, a certain segment of the world that is easily expressible by the type of symbolical means that language employs.

Language, with its categorial universe, is not a tool available to man, but a form of expression of community origin. A radical expression of the communicative nature of man can be observed in the multitude of means of communication nowadays, to which scientists such as Emile Benveniste and Roman Jakobson contributed from a conceptual point of view. Benveniste theorized the enunciation as the process of carrying the language into action in an individual act of volition, whereas Jakobson suggests a model of communication enriching the transmitter-message-receiver relationship with terms such as context, contact and code. The dialogue represents the authentic substance of the language that is the social process of verbal interaction. The background, the name given by Searle to reflexive knowledge or precomprehension, the term used by Heidegger and Gadamer, refers to determinations that see us as historical beings, dependent on the place of insertion in the social life. Not to be mistaken for intuition, precomprehension opens the impact of reality, and, as such, it is approximate knowledge, an anticipation of the world, inherent to every individual. It appears to us as individual, as a specific feature of the human being, but each singularity is projected on to the background of pluralism. This projection translates into a community of cultures and references, values and limits, or in what Heidegger referred to as the house of language.

The radicalization of the questionable thesis of the German philosopher in an irrationalist sense, attesting to which man can no longer overcome language, seems to force us to identify its degree of validity in the aspects of immediate reality. Emil Dorian's case is the typical Cartesian one that invites us to reason. Although he was one of the most important contemporary philosophers who wrote his work in French, during the last days of his life he involuntarily spoke exclusively Romanian. The relationship between the linguistic structures and the logical structures is one of the most profound philosophical problems and one of the most controversial issues of structuralism and epistemology in general. The understanding, as fundamental determination of the Dasein in Heidegger's vision, functions essentially through language, controlling and being controlled by it.

Jean Piaget (1971) analyses this interaction, considering as inappropriate the hypothesis of the sensorial-motor intelligence, performed in relation with the relatively late apparition of language in the second year of growth. The Swiss scientist mentioned that if speech depends upon an already partially structured intelligence, the reverse is also true; speech structures this intelligence, and here begin the real problem.

An abstract of the theory of communication would offer sufficient arguments to convince us that the interest of the researchers was focused mainly on the first component in the transmitter-receiver relationship, more exactly on the process of speaking. If the results obtained at this stage of the scientific investigation tend to be clear, the knowledge of the behavior of the receiver is incomplete. The area of research is thus open. The hypotheses, which are indispensable to science, make slow progress and they can not be verified. The linguistic theory does not assume a normative attitude towards the process of understanding the sentences because of the differences of conceptualization and signification of things and natural phenomena.

A clear explanation of what happens at the level of cerebral mechanism at the moment of message reception has not been offered by psychoanalysis yet. The difficulties we encounter in the process of making ourselves understood by the speakers of other languages, even if we are aware of the idiom, stem from the differences of the representations of the same objects that form the matter of the actual communication. These difficulties evolve gradually from unambiguous referential sentences (informative, didactic, etc.) to sentences with cognitive and expressive values, specific to philosophical, literary and poetic language.

From this perspective, it is obvious that frustration occurs to some degree when we are faced with a translation of Eminescu's poems into a foreign language. It is a widely spread belief among Romanian readers that the difficulty in the translation of the poems of our national poet transform us into prisoners of our own culture. This does not mean that you have to make the authentic substance of the poet's creation known throughout the world must be abandoned. The typical case of difficulties that seem insurmountable is the incorrect translation, both lexical and syntactic level.

Mihaela Ghiţescu and Mircea Dărbărescu have tried to reshape the patterns of the sentence in Romanian under the influence of other languages. Connoisseurs of the restrictive French eymologism, in which the predicative cannot be implicit, but compulsory expressed, the two writers have formulated sentences that are memorable, as they are unusual. They may lead to the conclusion that there is the possibility of mutations within the relations in Romanian, which would mean the deconstruction avant la lettre of the scientific content of the branch of knowledge.

In the translation of The Anarchist Banker of Fernando Pessoa, Mihaela Ghiţescu applies the syntactic French pattern on the Romanian sentences for the linking verbs to be and to become (1955: 64), as well as Mircea Dărbărescu, who applies the same formal principle in his De ce iubim femeile? (2004: 12)

The examples we bring into discussion do not invalidate the hypothesis that linking verbs, being intransitive, do not have the generative ability, therefore they do not command the complements. The demonstration of the intransitive property of the linking words is their incompatibility with the pronominalization of a hypothetical pronoun. The example in De ce iubim femeile? is presented in The Grammar of Romanian, in which Gabriela Pană Dindelegan offers a metaphorical value to the verb to be, although it is considered as a linking verb. The explanation given by the author causes confusion, as it is generally agreed that the metaphor relates to verbs and not to nouns.

In our opinion, in the above mentioned examples, the semantic content of the two linking words does not offer a transitive value, as they are not marked neither formally, nor logically. Talking about a syntactic relation in which a linking verb can subordinate an object means ignoring one of the most fundamental linguistic principles. Researchers use hypotheses in their work, and, in this particular case, the hypothesis of intransitivity is not confirmed, so the possibility to combine the two units is excluded.

These syntactic structures argue against the mechanics of a grammatical pattern structured on the classical schemes of sentence construction. They perform as a disruptive factor of the interaction between intellect and language because of their semantic inadequacy of pronouns and linking verbs. All things considered, we admit that the syntactic system of our language rejects the excessive grammar structures.

This true human, depending on his intellectual apparatus and his inspiration, can give a linguistic expression to the multitude of effective experiences, but each expression must comply with the validity of the grammatical axiom, with the strict division of the language as a system of communication governed by strict rules. This is the essence of axiomatic linking and admits that the two parts can be combined in one superior unit provided that it offers semantic compatibility that is if one of them is circumscribed in the area of determination of its counterpart.

Communication in intellectual communication exhibits forms that can be placed at the level of the concept of European humanism, but it also experiences ambiguity, immoderacy and errors. Phenomena such as those already presented can not be ignored, but they must be explained correctly. The modernity has developed both rigors and freedom. The academic establishment, by its authority and normative dimension, is responsible for achieving its task to supervise the preservation of the strictness in the area of language, which is defined as a determining phenomenon in inter-human relationships.

Interjection – personal deictic

ABSTRACT

This article presents the analysis of interjections as personal and social deictic indicators. Some Romanian interjections include information on interlocutor or sex. Deictic interjections are personal markers associated to person having the role of announcers. The most common interjections are iaă and iaca. Using these interjections draws attention to the interlocutor to a person or an object in the interlocution field. In colloquial Romanian language uses frequently vocatives materializing the utterance. Vocative forms are accompanied by interjections, and lately, under the influence of television and mass media, Romanian language has been influenced by English language introducing new interjections. The vocative is a strong mark of orality which permits, by endless construction variants, a multitude of stylistic and sociolinguistic nuances. The characteristics of familiar orality are emphasized by morphological markers and by using vocatives together with addressing interjections. Vocative is also the mark of orientation of the speaker towards the interlocutor.

KEYWORDS: personal deictic, social deictic, interlocutor, speaker, primary interjection, secondary interjection

Deictic words are defined in Dicționar de științe ale limbii such as: “class of words and grammar forms joining the totality of deixis marks, this class being unitary from semantic and functional point of view, but heterogeneous from grammar point of view”, deictic word is synonymous with deixis indicator. The class of deictic words is based on a common semantic characteristic: the missing of own reference and the identical style to obtain this reference grounded on a common pragmatic function: the role of deictic word is the sending towards the one of the components of the utterance situation: speaker, interlocutor, time, and place for utterance.

The class of deictic words include: grammatical affixes (time affixes and articulation affixes for the languages with article), grammatical forms (vocative forms and pronominal forms for first and second person) and whole morphological classes (adjective class and demonstrative pronouns, class of time adverbs, pronominal and non-pronominal, interjections class). Deictic words are included in pragmatic universals, covering acts of utterance, all types of sentences: assertive, interrogative, negative; class of words sending to the communication situation, therefore class of deictic words, and the organizing of sentence, etc. Linguistic universals are categories, properties, relations, and tendencies considering common to all languages, permitting different generalizations.

In Enciclopedia limbii române for deictic we have the following definitions: “ensemble of words and grammatical forms without own reference, and they obtain the reference from the context of utterance. The reference point in the act of utterance is the speaker, proportional to which the other components are defined”. The grammatical classes where the deictic words are included are: nouns (alteța, majestate), polite pronouns (dumneata, dumneavoastră), possessive pronouns (al meu, al tău), demonstrative adjective and pronoun (acesta, acela), adverbs and adverbial phrases (aici, acolo, acum, poimîine, saptămîna viitoare), articles (definition article used deictically Deschide ușa!), conjunctions and conjunctive phrases (oricum, în tot cazul), interjections of addressing (mă, bre, bă), paradigmatic forms for some flexible parts of speaking (nouns in vocative, forms of first and second person for personal pronouns), grammatical affixes (time suffixes), inflectional endings for first and second person of the verbs, deictic particles (-a, acuma; -șă, coloșă).

Characteristics in using deictic words for Romanian language:

- low frequency in personal deictic words in correlation with their use in emphatic stances or in marking the opposition
- the use of the first person plural instead the first person singular, a generalization form
- the use of the second person singular with a generic value
- the marking of the opposition speaker – listener using declaration verbs (zice, zic)
- the use of vocatives and interjections to select the interlocutor
- the use of the second person singular instead of the first person singular and the accumulation of the details to help the listener to transpose in the narrative situation și așa mai departe....

The paper is desired to highlight the use of the interjections as personal and social deictic words. The meaning of the interjections is obtained with the help of the situational and linguistic context, but also with the help of non-verbal means (mime, gestures, etc.) As the deictic words represent a heterogeneous class, so the interjection is “a heterogeneous class, because some interjections may be partly validated semantically and functionally with the verbs, nouns, adjectives and adverbs, taking over a part from the syntactic characteristics of these ones.” (GLR, 2005: 657)

Deictic interjections are marks associated to the person having the role of presenters. The most used interjections with deictic value are iată and iaca. By these interjections the interlocutor is determined to pay attention to a person or to an object from the interlocution field:

A! Iată conul Fănică!

(I. L. Țurculeț, O scrisoare pierdută, p. 45)

In the above examples the interjections iată and iaca suggest directly by gesture the object or the person in the situation of communication, and the message is decoded by the interlocutor. After Valeria Guțu Romalo there is “an organizer of transmission” suitable for the interjection iată, with a value of anaphoric deictic, being placed on the first place as an element with focus function to maintain the interest of the interlocutor. This interjection has a communicative reduced role.

The interjections hai and haideți are also associated to the person expressing the impulse and suggestion:

- Eu, cucoană am venit să fac focul.
- Haide, intră!

In the daily communication the interjections iată and haide have the value of “initiating stereotype” being used frequently in radio programmes and television. Another element which maintains the interest of the interlocutor is the interjection uite accompanied by the gesture or by the look:

Uite, veverița! Colo sus pe creangă. Uite-o!

(I. L. Dragăle, Năpasta, p. 224)

The vocative is a deictic mark of the person, and it is used by the speaker to separate a certain communicative role, and this role is named target. The function of the vocative means to identify an interlocutor and, indirectly, a speaker.

There is a major difference between the proper interjections which are conversational marks and onomatopoeic which imitated sounds and suggest movement.

Pragmatically onomatopoeic interjections are focused on the message, and the proper interjections are focused on the participants and the act of utterance. Anyway the both type of interjection are included in the deictic plan because they belong to the direct speech plan. The interjections măi and hei have an addressing value, but with a certain intonation they have an emotive value too. Romanian language has many interjections which can have multiple meanings and which cannot be decoded without a clear context: a, ah, e, ei, o, of, oh, uf, vai, eș. In Gramatica Limbii Române there are interjections with communicative functions “the prototype communicative function is emotive or expressive when the message is focused on the speaker, the interjection transmitting emotional states or different reactions of the speaker” (GLR, 2005: 665). The conversational function is met when the message is addressed to the interlocutor. In this category we introduce persuasive, presentation and addressing interjections.

The addressing represents the explicit indication “of the addressee by the emitter of a message using linguistic means accompanied or not by non-linguistic or paralinguistic elements”. (DSL, 2005: 27). The fundamental operations of addressing are represented by the naming of the addressee with nominal and pronominal forms and the solicitation of the addressee to assume this kind of role, using vocatives or imperatives. Romanian language has the following forms of addressing such as:

a) nouns: proper nouns (names, surnames, nicknames), and common nouns with certain semantic features: generic names (om, femeie, băiat, moș, babă, domn); generic names expressing interpersonal relationships (prieten, coleg, colegă); names of kinship (mamă, bunic, frate, mătușă); names denoting functions, jobs, and titles (ministru, doctor, duce, prinț, director); names showing ethnicity or regional provenience (oltean, ardelean, italian, francez, etc.); animal names or generic names referring to animals metaphorically (bou, măgar, animal, pui); mythological or religious names, used sometimes metaphorically (drac, înger, zeu, zeiță); names expressing qualification or evaluation (crai, hoț, tâlhar, etc.);

b) adjectives used as nouns by adding definite article, representing a subjective appreciation of the relationships between the interlocutors (drag, scump, iubit, stimat, etc.) or the interlocutor features (physical, moral) (prost, mincinos, frumos, deștept, etc.);

c) Cardinal or ordinal numerals used with noun value or used as nouns (cei trei, cei doi, al doilea, al treilea, etc.);

d) forms of the personal pronouns for the second person singular and plural and forms of the polite pronoun (tu, voi, dumneavoastră, domnia ta, mata, etc.).

The addressing interjections as măi, mă, fă (fa), bre have in speaking the same role as the vocative, therefore they are used to call someone to pay him to be attentive at the communication transmitted. These interjections are used alone or are accompanied by a noun in vocative:

Măi, nu cumva să vă împingă mititelul să intrați înaintea mea.

(I. Creangă, Povestea lui Harap-Alb)

De ce mai faci tu, măi flăcăule? îl întrebai eu. Ai ieșit cu oile la păscut?...

Dar ești vrednic tu, bre Niculăeș, să porți un cârd de oi?

(M. Sadoveanu, Un om necăjit)

De așino, ia, fa, secerile astea! strigă el supărat aruncând secerile.

(M. Preda, Moromeții)

The interjections fa, fă comes from the word fată and therefore we have some information about the sex of the interlocutor.

There are also addressing interjections which have the role not to call someone, but to make someone to be attentive at a thing or a fact ia, iacă, iată, iacătă, uite, etc. These are presentative or ostensive interjections with deictic value being used to show the interlocutor objects, persons, or events in the situational context. These interjections may be also used in the discursive context to introduce a statement.

Iacătă-o, măi, colo.

(I. Creangă, Povestea lui Harap-Alb)

In the deictic class there are also included interjections used as politeness formulas such as greeting formulas. The greeting formulas mean "conventional, fixed expressions with formula aspect, compulsory in some communicative situations to maintain positive relationships, being met in linguistic communities to serve for social interaction” (Aioanei, 2008: 75). The greeting helps the community members to interpret correctly the transmitted message. The greeting must respect some rules for creating solidarity with the interlocutor. The reverence is realized through these greeting formulas. Lately some changes have happened in the modality of greeting, taking new aspects, modern, sometimes being simplified. The greeting is “a linguistic even” (Berru, 1987: 21), the beginning and the end ritual between two people, and it is not compatible with all alternative pronominal forms. Romanian language has numerous greeting formulas. The equivalent for the familiar pronoun tu is represented by the following greetings “Bună”, “Noroc”, “Salut”, “Servus”, “Pa”, “Pa, pa”, “Pa, pa, pa”. These ones have been transformed in secondary interjections. “Bună dimineata”, “Bună ziua” and “Bună seara” are compatible with all alternative pronouns; the last two greeting formulas being compatible with the pronoun “Dumneavoastră”. The last two ones are ceremonial and very polite. The formula “La revedere” is compatible with both the distance pronoun and the familiar pronoun, starting to be observed as a polite form. Nowadays the use of this end formula do not transmit consolation anymore when it is used in the relation subordinate/superior (for example, student/professor). This formula has obtained a frequent use in all classes.

The formula “Sărut mâna” is not so used, being met in addressing towards women, especially older ones, in relation subordinate/superior (if the woman is in a superior position, in the relation man/woman, but also in the addressing towards a relative/ mother, aunt or grandmother). This behavior appears also older men (even in the addressing towards young girl). It remains a very polite greeting. Between young people this formula is rarely used, being met in the relation man/woman as an expression of respect and consideration. In a relation from subordinate (age, profession) to superior (student or to a teacher we respect a lot) or in rural environment a woman can address the doctor, being younger with the greeting “Sărut mâna”. However this addressing is rarely used in Romanian language between women. In the addressing the priest both in the rural environment and urban one, regardless the sex of the believer or the age of the priest it is used the formula “Sărut mâna”.

The simple formulas “Sănătate/Să fii sănătos” are seen as being very familiar, even if they are used in any language level. In the south of the country we meet frequently the friendly greeting “Hai să trăiești” or “Să trăiești” between relatives or friends, used especially in phone discussions or at the meeting between two friends. When a child says “Sărut mâna” to a relative, the latter answers with the formula “Să trăiești”, as a greeting and when someone thanks for the dinner (for example any child at the end of the dinner should say “Sărut mâna pentru masă”).

When there are religious celebrations or with the occasion of the New Year’s Eve we use some compulsory greeting forms/ the speaker says “La mulți ani”, “Sărbători fericite”, “Hristos a înviat”, and the interlocutor is urged to answer “Bun venit”, “Bun găsit”, “Drum bun”, “Adio”, “Să ne vedem cu bine”, “Mergi cu bine”, “Odihnă plăcută”, “Adevărat a înviat”, “Mergi cu Dumnezeu” (if the interlocutors are older people); they are used in different situational contexts. There are available another greeting formula for the interlocutor “Serviciu ușor”, “Numai bine”, “Spor la treaba”, “Să dea Dumnezeu” (as an answer).

In Romania, certain people in different social classes use own greeting formulas. For example, between Romanian peasants it is used the formula “Doamne ajută” when someone has been doing an activity for a long time, and the other person passes and says hello. The given answer is “Dă, Doamne”.

The vocative represents a powerful orally mark, which permits, through endless construction variants, a multitude of stylistic and sociolinguistic nuances. The characteristics of familiar orally are focused on the preference for the morphological marking (-e, -ule, -o, -lor) and the association of vocative forms with addressing interjections (Zafiu, 2002: 419).

Vocative Case:

zică: „Mărișor/pune-m mânăre//pune-m tu mânăre ațo lo

(TDM, III, 665)

Vocative marked morphologically + addressing interjections:

măi cuscrule!... că a făcut-o băieții ce să le facem? io n-am știut

(TDM, III, 665)

The vocative is also a mark of speaker's orientation towards the interlocutor. In regional Romanian language we meet the form domle, being a syntopacted variant (at the beginning it was used as an official addressing formula and then it was transformed in a mark of speaker's orientation towards the interlocutor).

a...venit domle/și am tranșat/...am vorbit... a să-n chestea nunți

(TDM, III, 132)

In the present Romanian mass-media texts the familiar language is often used by the personalities belonging to the high political spheres or/and to the present Romanian cultural ones (so-called VIPs). In some formal contexts (social, cultural or political) of communication, there are eliminated the hierarchical differences between the interlocutor, through wanted elimination of the official addressing forms. In the present newspaper texts the language belongs to the mountainous linguistic zone (south pragmatic subtype). (Manu, 2002) Social deixis elements have a personal deixis component, symbolic referential type that names the interlocutor, and they have a descriptive part which describes the social relation, anchored intrinsically deixis.

In conclusion, the deixis function of the vocative expressions places a certain referent in the temporal and spatial context. The vocatives of personal deixis are, in fact, built on social vein; therefore they depend on the social deixis. The vocative is also a deixis mark for the person, it serves as the separation of a certain communicative role, as the identification of the interlocutor and, indirectly, as the identification of the speaker. The colloquial Romanian language knows a high use of vocatives, through the materialization of the salient elements. The vocative forms are accompanied by interjections, and lately Romanian language has been influenced by English language introducing new interjections such as cool, shit, especially in television or mass-media.

In Romanian language there are some interjections that include information about the sex of the interlocutor. Romanian language uses interjectional deictic words, for example, iată, with the variants iaca, iacătă.

Issues in Designing ESP Courses

ABSTRACT

For teachers worldwide, an important part in dealing with ESP classes is choosing the appropriate materials in order to meet the needs of the learners. Designing an ESP course is often a difficult task to achieve since teachers are the ones who need to think in advance about what techniques to use, which materials to bring in class or how to evaluate knowledge.

The present paper will discuss learning theories as well as language use and needs analysis. ESP is part of General English, yet there are certain aspects that define it – learners acquire language for various purposes, the courses are designed to meet the needs of learners, the themes are in accordance with the activities of learners and even language has to be appropriate to these activities. At the same time, ESP courses are usually taught to adults for a certain period of time. These courses have as to them the specific language learners use at their workplace. Therefore, ESP courses need to be centered on learners, language and skills.

KEYWORDS: ESP, learner-centered, language-centered, skill-centered, communicative purposes, needs analysis

Lately, ESP has become an important aspect in teaching and acquiring a foreign language due to the international expansion of the English language in all fields of activity – business, medicine, engineering, technology, etc. Thus, a new group of learners emerged – those who are interested in learning English for professional purposes. ESP may also be found in certain studies as EOP or English for Occupational Purposes since it deals with teaching and acquiring this language in terms of its future use in different working situations – engineering, medicine, banking, etc. Yet different professions need and use different terminology, language is used differently depending on the context so teachers need to prepare in advance courses related to the domain of activity of the students involved in the process of learning. As Hutchinson & Waters said,

In short the view gained ground that the English needed by a particular group of learners could be identified by analyzing the linguistic characteristics of their specific area of work or study. 'Tell me what you need English for and I will tell you the English that you need' became the guiding principle of ESP.

Hužhinson & Waters prevalently uses the term need or needs thus emphasizing the reasons people learn English for, this term also being used by others in the field while defining ESP. Stevens in 1988 identified among the characteristics of ESP the one that is designed to meet specified needs of the learner, Robinson in 1991 agreed with the importance of needs analysis in ESP design. So, the two crucial factors in offering an effective and meaningful learning are the needs and interests of people learning this foreign language.

ESP emerged in the late 1960s and has evolved ever since passing through different stages – from the focus on language at the sentence level to the attention upon the rhetorical discourse, then to the emphasis on the needs analysis or large-scale situation analysis, ending with the skills-oriented approach, which mainly focuses on reading or listening skills. All these stages are based on describing language use, an important aspect in designing the right ESP courses. Yet an important aspect which shouldn't be neglected is the learning process – how teachers help students acquire language and how these students succeed in the process of language learning.

We often assume that describing and exemplifying what people do with language will enable someone to learn it. If that were so, we would need to do no more than read a grammar book and a dictionary in order to learn a language. A truly valid approach to ESP must be based on an understanding of the processes of language learning.

(Hužhinson & Waters, 1987: 14)

When designing courses, ESP teachers need to take into consideration the reasons students learn English, the aspects of language that are important in their case as well as the level of proficiency students need to achieve. One can not make a clear distinction among the factors that influence course design. All courses are based on certain learning theories but these theories are related both to the syllabus and the reasons of learning a language.

[...] ESP is an approach to language teaching which aims to meet the needs of particular learners. This means in practice that much of the work done by ESP teachers is concerned with designing appropriate courses for various groups of learners. Thus, whereas course design plays a relatively minor part in the life of the General English teacher – courses here usually being determined either by tradition, choice of textbook or ministerial decree – for the ESP teacher, course design is often a substantial and important part of the workload.

It is quite difficult to understand the needs of learners since these needs represent a laborious process that involve expectations, external requirements, past experiences, different ways of learning or acquiring information, the time when this learning takes place together with the period that courses are taught or presented to them. Some learners who already function in English-speaking environments and work may already have acquired the necessary terminology at a certain level but

They still lack communication knowledge. So, these are the skills that need to be worked upon together with the teacher through various role-plays that enhance their presentation skills. Yet, what shouldn't be neglected is the fact that adult trainees need to enhance their performance in job-related contexts.

Dan Kim in his English for Occupational Purposes. One Language, explains his experience when working with adults, choosing metaphors and comparisons that make the reader be transported into a story. His words perfectly describe the mixed feelings teachers are confronted with when starting a certain course and what happens as the lessons pass and things begin to change. As a teacher you could never expect courses to follow a specific pattern or an already-designed plan.

I entered the field with an open mind like a musician, having a pre-composed score to follow but also expecting opportunities to improvise. As the study unfolded, I confronted many challenges and unexpected changes and thus realized that this work would indeed be a makeshift, like jazz.

The design of the course should meet all these requirements and take into consideration all aspects involved. Professional textbooks may also be used yet it is quite difficult to find a certain textbook that comprises all necessary elements for a successful acquisition of languages for specific purposes. ESP teachers may also use "traditional" materials especially when it comes to grammar and the structural way of presenting language. The structural ways of presenting language are useful to learners since these surface structures open the gate for the deeper level rules of language form. They can be taken from grammar practice books and be changed according to the level of proficiency and the needed terminology. ESP students usually have some knowledge of general English, they are acquainted with basic grammar, so, for them, the learning of English becomes a matter of using language correctly in different situations and contexts. Structural language supports the functional use so one cannot separate them. ESP books, be it of Business English, English for Medicine, English for Engineering, and so on, have lately presented specific syllabus that contain both structures and contexts which, in the end, determine appropriate functions. An example is taken from the syllabus of the textbook "Business Result" for the pre-intermediate level:

	Unit 1	Companies
Working with words?		To many facts (produce, specialize in, head office, competitor, employee, etc.)
Language work?		Present Simple
Practically speaking?		How to make polite requests
Business communication?		Socializing – Introducing yourself and others
	Unit 2	Contacts
Working with words?		Describing your job and your job contexts (consist of, involve, take part in, colleague, consultant, customer, etc.)

Language a/work	Present continuous
Practically speaking	How to say phone numbers and spell names
Business communication	Telephoning – Making and receiving telephone calls

Unit 3

Working with words

Language a/work
Practically speaking
Business communication

Visitors

Company structure (in charge of, responsible for, sales and marketing, human resources, etc.)
 Asking questions
 How to welcome visitors
 Presenting – Visual information “
 (taken from Business Result – Pre-intermediate, Students’ Book, Oxford University Press, 2009)

One can easily observe how the above exemplified syllabus is a mix of all levels of teaching and learning English for Business purposes. Language is presented in context, specific vocabulary items are clearly represented, speaking activities are related to real-life situations, so, we talk about an interference among several factors; the structural, functional and discursive levels.

Ever since the 1990s, a series of textbooks or materials have appeared so that teachers might have the possibility of choosing the ones that suit their classes best. Yet it is their role in assessing and developing the materials they will use in class. Finding the right materials is only a first, but very important step in teaching ESP. The used textbooks present language in real situations, using language specific to a particular discipline. At the same time, teachers need to undergo a revision process as courses develop so that they are sure that they meet the learners’ needs and indeed have effect upon their learning. In Ruiz-Garrido’s book English for Professional and Academic Purposes, Ana Botanegra-Valle calls ESP teachers practitioners because of their involvement in choosing and adapting the right materials for their courses.

[...] Firstly, available materials are reviewed, evaluated and selected according to different criteria and with reference to a particular ESP course. Then, if there is a lack of materials or if materials available are not suitable according to such evaluation, practitioners might be required to develop materials from scratch or abridge, extend, refine, rewrite – in short adapt – the available materials for a particular learning situation, ESP area, large group of learners, timing or set of resources. There exists the possibility that although there are materials available for classroom use, practitioners feel the need to provide additional materials for out-of-classroom work, self study or the like.

What teachers should keep in mind is the fact that no matter how well a syllabus is organized so that it includes all levels of communication, it has no effect if teachers do not use the different ways students perceive certain information or acquire language. It has been known that people learn differently and ever since the beginning of the 20th century several theories have evolved.

According to the behaviourist theory, learning is a mechanical process being based on the stimulus-response concepts. For the behaviourists, people acquire languages easier if they first hear then speak, read and write. Repetition is frequently used as well as the immediate correction of errors. Translation is not to be used. Even nowadays certain techniques from this behaviourist methodology are being used in the form of drills. This theory and its methods better applies to children, especially the younger ones, who base their knowledge mainly on hearing and then repeating the new information. It's been shown that younger children who do not know how to write or read acquire foreign languages easily using the audio-lingual method. While for adults or some adolescents this method does not always have results since grown-ups are used to acquire new information based on a written and then read form. Some adults do not respond well as to stimuli while others may prefer it. This Audio-lingual method has certain drawbacks that the mentalist theory has brought in to discussion.

When the behaviorist view of learning prevailed, language course design usually consisted of drills and practice of discrete grammar items focusing mainly on mastering the correct form. As the attention shifted to the communicative aspect of language use, language was viewed as a means for communication in realistic (as opposed to idealistic) social contexts.

Mentalists consider that repetition helps people learn patterns only in certain circumstances and they will not be able to use these patterns in other situations. Another theory that has been of great help for teachers is the cognitive one which focuses on the active role of learners in the process of language acquisition. The process of making sense of data and rules is transposed into the problem-solving technique which is mainly used in exercises and tasks that work on developing reading skills.

The cognitive view of learning seems to answer many of the theoretical and practical raised by behaviourism. It treats the learners as thinking beings and puts them firmly at the center of the learning process, by stressing that learning will only take place when the material to be learned is meaningful to the learners. But in itself a cognitive view is not sufficient. To complete the picture we need an affective view too.

(Hulstinson & Waters, 1987: 46)

This last theory perceives learners as human beings with preferences, dislikes and different motivational factors. Some people learn ESP from an internal desire to find out as many things as possible about this language, while others, and here we talk about the majority of them, learn English because they need it at school, work or for different projects. Yet, teachers should not rely only on specific materials and take for granted the fact that if learners need to learn they will immediately enjoy the process. So courses should be enjoyable and attractive to learners.

At the beginning of each ESP course, teachers are faced with the issue of what the students need English for. Hutchinson & Waters considers that What distinguishes ESP from General English is not the existence of a need as such but rather an awareness of the need. If learners, sponsors and teachers know why the learners need English, that awareness will have an influence on what will be acceptable as reasonable to learn in the language course and, on the positive side, what potential can be exploited.

Since students at this level have a clear perception of their needs, teachers may try to form a Needs Analysis Questionnaire that points out specific areas of interest for the group or the person they work with. The questionnaire may be formed of several areas to be answered as You and your job; Communication skills; Business topics; Specific interests. In the first area teachers may ask students questions about the company they work for, their position in the company, the company's main area of business and in which situations they use English at work. Regarding the communication skills involved in any course, students may need to rank their preferences according to the time they spend on different communication skills.

For Business English, they may choose among certain categories such as discussions, meetings, social English, telephoning, presentations, negotiations, business correspondence or job interviews. Some students may rank all these situations equally since they need to use English in all areas of business communication. Others may be interested only in business correspondence since, at work, they only use English to send and receive e-mails. In the area of Business Topics, students may choose among several topics they are interested in and even add topics of their own such as management, human resources, travel, trade, finance, etc.

In the Specific Interest part, students are free to describe their favourite type of lessons – some may say they are interested mainly in speaking, others in writing and so on. At the end of the questionnaire, it becomes a matter of compromise between teachers and students regarding what they should focus on during the course. Teachers should always bear in mind the fact that the large language is not enough if they do not consider how learning takes place. Activities and tasks need to be enjoyable, manageable and motivating.

Designing courses is not a streamlined process. When doing so, teachers should try to combine all approaches of course design: language, skills and learners. The needs analysis offers teachers immediate answers upon the large language of the students. This large language helps teachers find and design materials to be used during courses but this process alone is not sufficient. Certain strategies have to be used in order to help students acquire specific language and develop various skills. At the same time, learners play an active role throughout the entire English course. Therefore, courses vary with time, materials change and activities differ so that they involve the entire attention of the students.

Does English Still Borrow Words from Other Languages?

Cristina Gabriela MARIN

ABSTRACT

Today, English borrows words from other languages with a truly global reach. Some examples that the Oxford English Dictionary suggests entered English during the past 30 years include marka dal, a creamy Indian lentil dish (1984, from Hindi), quinzhee, a type of snow shelter (1984, from slave or another language of the Pacific Coast of North America) affogato, an Italian dessert made of ice cream and coffee (1992). One obvious thing that these words have in common is that not all English speakers will know them. Probably affogato and marka dal are likeliest to be familiar to British readers but they do not yet belong to the vocabulary that you would expect just about every British person to know and experiences will differ greatly in different parts of the world.

KEYWORDS: borrow, trend, familiar, speakers, global

The number of new borrowed words finding their way into the shared international vocabulary is on a long downward trend. It is very hard to be precise about the boundaries of the vocabulary of any language, especially a global one like modern English. Every speaker of a language has a slightly different vocabulary. English speakers living in New Zealand are likely to be familiar with a wider range of words of Maori origin, like pakeha, a New Zealander of European descent & aroaha (sympathy understanding), kia ora (a greeting or farewell). English speakers in Scotland may know more words of Scottish Gaelic origin, like cranachan, (a type of dessert), pibroch (a bagpipe music). Dictionaries, even very big ones like the OED, monitor those words that have had some traction in English across the world. This sort of monitoring reveals some surprising trends. Although English is now borrowing from other languages with a worldwide range, the number of new borrowed words finding their way into the shared international vocabulary is on a long downward trend. One big reason for this is the success of English as an international language of science, scholarship, business and many other fields. If we think about the words coming into English from foreign languages in the 18th and 19th centuries, we may think first of the impact of colonialism and expanding trade. Words like jungle (1776), bangle (1787), yoga (1818) khaki (1863) came into English from language of South Asia. But in many other cases new words slipped into English as a result of scientific images in other European languages. For example, oxygen reflects the French name oxygène that scientists Lavoisier and Berthollet

Moreau gave to French by derived elements in the 1870-s. The word is formed from elements that ultimately come from Greek, but it was coined in French and then borrowed into English. A similar story applies to paraffin formed in German in 1830 (from Latin elements), and then borrowed into English in 1835. Other borrowings like semester (1829) or seminar (1889) reflect German innovations in education. Such borrowings are still sometimes found today, but have become much less common, as English has become the lingua franca of the world of learning (and of so many other fields). Today, the balance is tipping much more towards English as a donor of new words (e.g., internet, computer, cell phone, meeting, business) rather than a borrower. By contrast, new borrowings into English today tend to cluster much more closely in a few subject areas, especially names of food and drink. If we look back further, it was in the Middle Ages that the everyday vocabulary of English was affected most deeply by borrowing from the other languages. In the wake of Norman conquest, French and Latin put English in the shade for centuries as the language of learning, the church, law and officialdom.

Even everyday business records were typically written in Latin or French down to the late 1300-s. This has left an indelible mark on the English language today. Words like age, air, cause, city, idea, join, material, poor, suffer, tax have become part of the fabric of modern English. Some words slowly build up in frequency. For instance, the word sushi is first recorded in English in the 1890-s, but the earliest examples in print all feel the need to explain what sushi is, and it is only in recent decades that it has become ubiquitous, as sushi has spread along in most corners of English-speaking world. But common place though may be today, it has not made its way into the inner core of English in the same way as words like peace, war, just or very (from French) or leg, sky, take or they (from Scandinavian language). This is not just because they were borrowed longer ago. It owes a great deal to the different influences that foreign languages have had on the word-stock of English over the centuries.

Phillip Durkin (Oxford English Dictionary: 19) shows how patterns of borrowed words reflect complex patterns of cultural contact across centuries. He imagines a scene where you “take off your jodhpurs upon your pyjamas, and sit on the verandah of your bungalow”. You could add to this scene some chintz curtains, a baby in a cot wearing dungarees smuggled under a shawl his mother with freshly shampooed hair wearing a pashmina and a bangle or two – all in all a shy or even pukka unless the peace is disturbed by a passing juggernaut (originally an image of Krishna dragged through the street on an enormous chariot). It is interesting how early many of these words entered English, e.g., chintz (1614) cot (1634) shawl (1662) bungalow (1676).

Many of the South Asian borrowings that have entered everyday British English have first dated in the OED in the 1600-s, 1700-s, or early 1800-s rather than in the high days of Empire – but they have been followed in the 20-th and 21-st centuries by a new wave of borrowings, including names of dishes such as rogan or josh (1934), passanda (1961), or jalfrezi (1979) as South Asian culture and cuisine have made their impact in Britain and elsewhere in the post-colonial era. Today

English in India, like every other variety has its own distinctive words and uses, not all of which result just from borrowing. For instance, the word prepone (bring forward, i.e. the opposite of postpone) is in Indian English.

The present paper draws attention to some of the words of Spanish origin that still carry an unmistakable tinge of the Old West such as corral, bronco, chap (short for chaparreras) rodeo, and lasso to which you could add bonanza, canyon, stampede, lariat, or the hands and by of cowboy films vamoose (literally let's go). The Spanish influence is there in words and flavours on the high street today – such as tacos, fajitas or tequila. Many of these words are now also very familiar in English and them to other “Englishes” all around the world. This sort of borrowing between varieties of English grows even more in importance as the global spread of English continues. As English has come to have such a global importance exchanges between English and other languages flourish even in places where there have never been very large numbers of first language speakers of English. The following examples are from South America. For instance, English and Portuguese continue their give-and-take relationship. Among English words in common use in Portuguese, some show little or no change, like baby-sitter, deliver self-service, show, check-up, shopping-centre, mall, bike, drink while others may be just a little harder for English speakers to spell in their new Portuguese forms such as chequim, ianque, beisebol, voleibol, sanduche, tenis, vagao, futebol, trailer (i.e. check-in, yankee, baseball, volleyball, sandwich, tennis, wagon, football, trailer). American Spanish guachimán (watchman or guard) and guava (wire) were other words noted from elsewhere in South America. Among borrowings in the other direction, from Portuguese to English, it can be noted ubiquitous samba as well as favela (shanty-town), caipirinha (a Brazilian drink), cachaca (rum-like spirit), acai (type of palm-fruit), and the aggressive, predatory piranha (borrowed into English in the early 1700-s). Some others are mango, pagoda, monsoon (all borrowed back in the 1580-s), mongoose (1673), teak (1678), or cuspidor (1179). Sometimes, it is hard to be certain whether a word has come into English from Portuguese or Spanish, for instance castle, hurricane, banana, molasses, flamingo, grandee (all borrowed in the 1550-s) yam or pimento (both mid-1660-s).

In very many cases, English has borrowed a word from one language that had previously borrowed it from elsewhere. Among those Portuguese and Spanish words there are many that originated among speakers of very different languages. For instance, piranha comes ultimately from Tupi (a language of Brazil) and acai comes from a related language called Nheengatu while mango is probably ultimately Malayalam across the other side of the world in India, and monsoon is ultimately from Arabic and, in a further twist, Dutch may also have played a hard role in how it came into English from Portuguese.

It is often useful to distinguish between immediate and remote origins of words. For instance, among the French borrowings into English, peace comes from earlier form of French paix which goes right back to the Latin origins of French language (the Romans spoke about pax), but war comes from a northern variant of French guerre a word which French originally borrowed from Germanic relative of French and Dutch. A similar example noted is boulevard, a word that English borrowed from French in the 1769-s but that French itself borrowed in the Middle Ages from Dutch bolwerk or a related word, making the word seem more familiar by substituting the ending “-ard” of words like “plazaard”. In some cases English acts as the intermediary, cake probably came into English from early Scandinavian in the 1200-s but has since been borrowed from English in numerous languages in Europe and beyond. Prestige or even fashion can have a big impact on patterns of borrowing. For instance, the English-speakers in Japan are enthusing over the Japanese bento box with its separate compartments for different items, while Japanese are now often calling the same thing a lunch-box. What is to be cool – a word that English has spread around the world in the recent decades, like OK. The category of words denoting food and drink can also be an interesting light on cultural, social and economic history. For example, marmalade is a surprisingly early borrowing into English directly from Portuguese in 1400-s. The same borrowing is found in most other Western European languages in modern German (it is the common word for jam) but much later than in English. Its early arrival in English is probably the result of close diplomatic and trading relations between Portugal and England in the Middle Ages. Italian bistecca (beefsteak) reflects the association of the English-Speaking world with beef eating. The French go further, having been in the habit of referring to the English as rosbifs (or roastbeefs) since at least the 1770-s.

Borrowings can often take on quite new meanings in their new language such as French le relooking (makeover), le self (celebrity), Spanish el footing (jogging), German das controlling (corporate finance) or, of course, das handy (mobile phone). But perhaps, for an English speaker nothing can quite beat the frisson of hearing familiar words turning up in unexpected places like French le weekend or le parking, or in German das baby or expressions like ich will doch up to date sein (I want to be up to date), or even ich was overdressed (I was overdressed). Just sometimes, though, many languages across the world will have similar words in the same meaning for reasons other than borrowing.

The obvious example is probably from words for “mother” and “father” around the world that are superficially similar to mama, dada, or papa. Such words ultimately go back to the sounds that babies throughout the world produce they first start to make as the art of producing distinct speech sounds. Sometimes words of this type can be borrowed between languages, for example, the early use of papa in our day and refined circles in English makes a French origin seem reasonably probable, but it remains very hard to rule on the possibility of independent origin. For this reason, we will probably never be entirely certain whether dad came into English from Welsh – just like baby, the word mentioned above.

The article “Where do our words come from?” (Durkin, 2014) offers some answers on the origins of language and borrowed words. The first example is poltergeist which first appeared in English in the 1840-s and is now uncommon in the 19th century writing about the paranormal – a topic that interested many Victorians greatly. In German, poltergeist has a much longer history; it is found frequently in

The writings of the 16th-century religious reform Martin Luther. It is from polter “to make a loud noise or uproar” and geist “spirit, ghost”. The second example is “Kiwi” which is a Maori word for a type of flightless bird and was borrowed into English in the 1800-s. It is found as a nickname for New Zealand sports teams, soldiers, to refer to parades members, etc. from the early 1990-s. It is found as a name for the Chinese gooseberry only from the 1960-s after these began to be exported from New Zealand. Macaroni came into English from Italian in the 1600-s (although the related macaroon came earlier, via French). Office comes from French (around 1300-s, while cargo and aficionado both come from Spanish in the 1800-s. Although, it looks like French form, miniature almost certainly came into English directly from Italian miniatura in the 1580-s. It is not found in French until the 1640-s (police, rampart and parol are all of French origin and entered English in 1400-s, 1500-s and 1600-s). Taboo was borrowed into English directly from Tongan in the 1770-s. It is first recorded in the journals of the navigator and explorer Captain James Cook. Rucksack was borrowed into English in the mid-1800-s from German. It is formed from Ruck and sack, variant of Ruck (en) (back) and sack (bag, sack). Although back-pack, pack-sack and knapsack are not borrowings, pack and knapsack probably both are from Dutch. The word tomato comes from Nahuatl tomatl and it came into English via Spanish tomate. In English, the word was also originally tomate; the modern form tomato probably results from association with the name of a different plant variety of American origin, the potato.

Several words and phrases from South Africa have become part of Standard English. Some have origins in Afrikaans or local native languages, or are adaptations of Standard English words. They include aardvark, apartheid, Boer, com-mando, eland, homeland, kraal, rand, spoor, springbok, trek and veld.

Many of the words relating to local fauna, flora and culture are not known outside South Africa. Local institutions and social groups also fall in this category, often providing opaque abbreviations to the outsider, as in the case of Bop (“Bophuthatswana”), Tuks (University of Pretoria) and Zim (“Zimbabwean”). Among the general items found in this variety are arvey (afternoon), bakkie (a type of truck), bell (to phone), bioscope (cinema), bottle store (liquor store), butchery (butcher’s shop), camp (paddock), dingers (chewing gum), dorp (village), fundi (expert), gogga (insect), indaba (meeting), kloof (ravine), lekker (nice), putu (a kind of porridge), robot (traffic-light), verkrampste (narrow-minded). A few also can be found in other varieties of English such as advocate (barrister) in Scotland and shebeen (illegal liquor establishments in Ireland).

An important source for distinctive vocabulary is the Dictionary of South-African English (4th ed., 1991), which contains some 4,000 fully illustrated entries. Among regional words and expressions recorded so far are bathing-box (bathroom), or tablecloth (the cloud covering Table Mountain).

The following words and phrases are possible varieties of English in West Africa (Sierra Leone, The Gambia and Nigeria): chop (food), delayance (delay), kola (fruit used as stimulant), lappie (a piece of cloth worn by women around the waist down to the feet). There is a change in form and perhaps a change in meaning for

The following examples: aunt (a female friend of one's parents), head tie (a piece of cloth worn around the head by women), headtie (head address), handkerchief (a kind of scarf used by women to cover their hair), bush meat (flesh of wild animals killed for food), compound house (fence-in yard), danfo (minibus), next tomorrow (the day after tomorrow), globe (electric bulb), palaba (disagreement/argument), rentage (rent), slowly-slowly (lived by lived), yellow fever (traffic warden).

The African-American presence in the USA has made a substantial impact on English vocabulary. Until the mid-19th century, most of this lexicon reflected the status and conditions of slavery. A great deal of it consisting of insult and invective. Increasingly, thereafter, the language showed the efforts to move towards a better one.

According to David Crystal (2003: 123-124) the following examples have early 19th century sources: slave driver (an overseer of slaves) – later it was used to denote a harsh and demanding employer – nigger love (abolitionist), free papers (a document given to slaves as proof of their status).

Many of the words which belong to South African English appear very early in the history of the country, as is evident from the files of the Rhodes University research programme for a Dictionary of South African English on Historical principles. Among the earliest examples are dagga (cannabis), karass (skin blanket), trunk (prison).

J. Branford & W. Branford (1991: 230-232) claim that there are over 2,500 lexical items in the dictionary files, of which nearly half (48%) were of Dutch Afrikaans origin, followed by English (29%), and another language (11%). There are signs in the 1990s that African languages are already beginning to make an increasing impact.

Another important aspect related to the present paper is the Colonial Legacy, which is presented by other languages, which came to the Caribbean because of colonialism. This process has left a powerful impact on the English of the region. French and Spanish are especially most representative.

Loans include armadillo, cascadura (a fish), sancoche (a soup with fish), paca (a rodent). Loans from native American languages via Spanish include chicle (Aztec), iguana (Arawak), manatee (Caribbean).

Loans from French include flamboyant (a tree), ramier (a pigeon), fete (a house party or picnic). Several words are associated with particular islands. For example, a parang is a house-to-house serenade and Christmas time found in Trinidad and Tobago. A punta is a vigorous group dance associated with Belize.

South Asia has been the source of several words in Standard English: bandana, Brahmin, bungalow, caste-mark, chabra, cheetah, cherrot, chintz, chit, chutney, colleen, curry, dacoit, guru, jodhpurs, juggernaut, jungle juice, mogul, nirvana, pundit, purdah, rajah, rupee, sahib, tiffin, verandah, yoga, etc.

Many of the words are likely to be known and used throughout South Asia, but definitive supranational studies of regional variation has to be undertaken: affectee (someone affected), bearer (waiter), boots shoes (tennis shoes), cent percent (a hundred per cent), conveyance (means of transport), cartops (carrings), eveninger (evening paper), flying coach (a type of bus), freeship (scholarship), hotel (eating house), allottee (person allocated property), ayah (nurse), bandh (labour strike), chapatti (a kind of bread), cousin-brother (sister male/female cousin), cow-worship (religious practice), dhobi (washerman), Doordarshan (TV network), Eve-teasing (harassment of women), godown (warehouse), goonda (hooligan), head-bath (hair-washing), issueless (childless), moot (meeting), opticals (eyeglasses), jawan (soldier), kaccha road (dirt road), nose-screw (Woman's nose ornament), panchayat (village council), ryot (farmer), stepney (spare-wheel), tiffin (room).

Conclusion

The aim of the present paper is to emphasize that the use of English is a subject which never ceases to amaze as we unravel layer after layer its complexity. Today, it is as subject which seems never-ending; people are always finding new contexts and applications for it. The present-day world status of English is primarily the result of two factors: the expansion of British colonial power, which peaked toward the end of the 19th century and the emergence of the United States as the leading economic power of the 20th century. The dominant role of English as a world language focuses upon our attention in a way that no language has ever done before. The rich variety of English vocabulary reflects the vast number of words it has taken from other languages. These range from Latin, Greek, Scandinavian, Celtic, French, Italian, Spanish to among others Hebrew, Maori, Malay, Chinese, Hindi, Japanese and Yiddish. The paper, also, aims to reveal the origins of some loanwords and why they were adopted by English language. All this complex process of English etymology and loanwords includes to do with languages in a variety of aspects concerning the dissemination of Christian culture in Latin, in Anglo-Saxon England; and the interactions of French, Celtic, etc. exposure to languages throughout the world during the colonial era; and the effects of using English as international language of science.

Anglicisms in economic language. Morphological norms

ABSTRACT

The expansion of the terminological stock by means of borrowings from English is a current phenomenon in Romanian and in economic language. International economic terms and their Romanian equivalents may be used concurrently. Generally, economic terms are neutral invariable nouns, adjectives and verbs. The different systems of the two languages determine difficulties of morphological classification in Romanian. Many synagms are phrasological calques. The English model can be altered by an approximate transposition in Romanian.

KEYWORDS: Anglicism, borrowing, economic, norm, calque

1. The language of economics has a complex structure, being subjected to constant change and enlargement. It is an instrument used not only in economic sciences (management, marketing, banking and finance, commerce, stock exchange, business), but also in the media, a vector widely promoting specialized vocabulary. Such terms as money, costs, market, supply, capital, inflation, investment, profit etc. reflect a series of situations in the evolution of economic phenomena. “The exchange and the money prove that economy is a universal market, where people sell and buy, because all goods have a price. Economy is extremely complex, establishing multiple relations between economic agents and institutions generating multiple communication possibilities.” (Rogojeanu, 2003)

The literature in the field has been concerned with the economic language, especially in the last two decades, after the socio-political change of 1989. The Romanian and foreign linguistics research focuses on terminology (as specialized/specialist vocabulary) (Ponsănescu, 1996; Stoichițoiu-Khim, 2006; Mușeanu, 2010; Athu, 2011), lexicography (Dobrotă, 1999; Topală, 2000) and discourse (Samuels, 1989; Dudley-Evans, Henderson (eds.), 1990; Bernard, D. Colli, 1994). The borrowing of terms from other fields, as well as the presence of Anglicisms in the language of economics are the consequences of the complexity and openness of the economic fields in the age of globalization. The socio-political conditions and the expansion of Romania's economic-financial relations with the West involve steady communication among specialists. They allow the enlargement and modernisation of the vocabulary with new elements. The media play an important role in the spreading and evaluation of Anglicisms. The enlargement of

The economists' vocabulary with Anglicisms is a current phenomenon. The companies developing businesses at an international level use English as a code that everyone knows in employment relations.

The process of standardising Anglicisms (Avram, 1997; Topală, 1998; Topală, 2006; Adu, 2011) is an important linguistic issue, since many economic terms are used not only by specialists, but also by some non-specialists. General dictionaries of the Romanian language have recorded some economic terms as Anglicisms: advertising, banking, banner, barter, brand, broker, business, card, cash, dealer, discount, dividend, dumping, fixing, job, leader, leasing, manager, market, offshore, trend etc. They are recorded as neuter and masculine nouns, some of them also having plural forms (bannere, branduri, brokeri, business-uri, carduri, dealeri, discount-uri, dividend etc.).

2. The analysis we have carried out on the morphological behaviour of Anglicisms concerns 24 economic terms (nouns, adjectives and verbs), that we have briefly defined and illustrated in current examples selected from the Romanian online press:

Some of these terms are recorded in more recent dictionaries of the Romanian language: in DOOM (bond, boom, provider, self-made-man), in DOR³ (bond, boom, bubble, factoring, hedging, manageriza, merchandising, overdraft, provider, self-made-man, sold-out, targeta), in Dicționarul ilustrat de cuvinte și sensuri recente în limba română (*boom, factoring, hedging, jobber, manageriza, marketiza, merchandising, overdraft, provider, self-made-man, sold-out, swap, targeta*¹).

3. As for standardisation, these terms come within the scope of Anglicisms, words preserving etymological writing and a pronunciation as close to the original one as possible. The morphological norms are more complex, since the gender of nouns represents a grammatical category expressed differently in the two unrelated languages. The inclusion of English words in Romanian causes problems with regard to gender and number. In English, grammatical gender is marked by formal inflections at the noun level or at the level of inflectional markers. The gender of the noun is highlighted by different pronoun forms (personal pronouns in the 3rd person, possessive pronouns and adjectives, reflexive pronouns). Number is not a category characterising only some of the nouns under analysis. The Anglicisms which are count nouns fall within the morphological system of the Romanian language as neuter or masculine nouns. When they also have a plural form, the desinences of neuter nouns are -e and -uri, the desinence of masculine nouns is -i (bonduri, boom-uri, jobberi, overdraft-uri, provideri, mass-marketuri). Romanian takes over the English plural form in the case of the noun self-made-men. Adject-

Verbal Anglicisms are invariable and quite easily associated with neuter and masculine nouns, in general. Verbal Anglicisms are oriented toward productive conjugations, with the inflexional suffix -a, -i, -ui. As a whole, verbs are formed from nouns. As far as tense and mood are concerned, the present tense of the indicative is specific to the discourse of economists. The updating of information based on real facts explains the presence of these grammatical categories in verbs.

The morphological behaviour of economic terms reflects the general behaviour of Anglicisms. The morphological and orthographic standardisation of this segment of borrowings in the Romanian language is included in Dicționarul ortografic, ortoepic și morfologic al limbii române (DOOM). At the lexical level, regardless of the difficulties caused by the adaptation to the linguistic system of the Romanian language, Anglicisms and borrowings from English, in general, are still enriching not only specialized languages, but also common language, accelerating the process of vocabulary enlargement.

Typological remarks on comparative clauses

ABSTRACT

In this paper, several typological remarks on comparative constructions are made based on crosslinguistic evidence and on the description of how a given language chooses to express a particular concept or how the grammar of a language constrains the expression of that concept.

KEYWORDS: language, comparative clauses, crosslinguistic

Introduction

Increasing studies on crosslinguistic data¹ have analysed the diverse empirical picture that comparisons present across languages and pointed out the grammatical factors that decide upon the appearance of these constructions. Thus, some parameters² were proposed that would explain the different comparative constructions that can be found within one language or across languages.

1. Crosslinguistic studies on comparison

1.1. Stassen (1985)

One example is the typological work on comparison by Stassen (1985). In order to establish a crosslinguistic typology of comparison constructions in the framework of Typological Universal Grammar, Stassen (1985) started from a semantic definition³ of the notion of 'comparative construction'. He was mainly concerned with the case of comparison of inequality, which in his opinion involved three things: a gradable predicative scale, which represented the property on which the comparison was made, and two concepts, one of which represents the standard against which the other is measured and found to be unequal (Stassen, 1985: 24).

Stassen limits his analysis to cases of NP-comparison and adopts the following terminology: the linguistic codification of the predicative scale in a comparative construction is termed the comparative predicate or simply the predicate (which in the majority of cases has the form of a predicatively used adjective) and, of the two NPs in the construction, the NP which indicates the object that serves as a yardstick for comparison is referred to as the standard NP and the other NP, which refers to the objective of the mental operation of comparison, is called the comparee NP. Thus, in sentence (1), the NP Frank is the standard NP and the NP Mary is the comparee NP. The predicative adjective tall, which names the scale on which the comparison takes place, is the comparative predicate in this particular comparison construction:

(1) Mary is taller than Frank.

Based on this, Sassen identified several features of comparative constructions which constituted the starting point of his categorization into types, in which the encoding of the standard NP was taken to constitute a highly significant factor. Therefore, a first dichotomy he proposed involved a split between derived-case comparatives and fixed-case comparatives. The parameter upon which the first distinction is based has to do with the procedure by which grammatical case is assigned to the standard NP.

In one group are the languages in which this case assignment appears to be non-unique; that is, the case of the standard NP depends on the case of the comparee NP (in short, if comparee NP in the construction functions as a subject and is therefore put in the nominative, then the standard NP will also have nominative case; if the comparee NP is in the accusative case, the standard NP will also be marked for accusative). Sassen calls the comparative constructions in which this situation appears derived-case comparatives.

In the other group, Sassen included the languages in which the standard NP is put in one and the same oblique case form in all instances of comparison, no matter what the case form of the comparee NP may be (in other words, the case assignment to the standard NP is independent of the case assignment to the comparee NP). Comparatives which exhibit this feature were called fixed-case comparatives.

Another parameter discussed by Sassen involved the strategy that a language employs in order to form a comparative construction. Thus, we can distinguish between languages that use a verbal strategy (exceed-type languages), languages that use a conjunctive strategy to express comparison and languages that use comparative particles that accompany the standard NP (-er/more in English, plus in French or mai in Romanian).

Examples of these language types are given in (2)-(4). In (2) we illustrate with the example given in Sassen (1985) from Yoruba (a West African language) an exceed-type language, in (3) with Moči, a language that illustrates the conjoined comparative construction (Bečková et al. 2009) and in (4) with the corresponding English comparison using comparative particles. All three languages convey the information that there is an ordering of Mary's position on the height scale relative to Frank's to the effect that Mary's is higher (i.e. (5)), but the structures used look very different

(2) Yoruba (Sassen, 1985: 43)

'He is bigger than him'

(3) Moči (Bečková et al., 2009)

Mary na lata, to Frank na kwadoḡi.

Mary TOP ㇿㇿ, bu ㇿ Frank TOP shor ㇿ
 ‘Mary is taller than Frank.’

(4) English

Mary is taller than Frank is.

(5) ㇿ-----F-----M----->

The data and conclusions offered in Sassen (1985) about the crosslinguistic typology of comparative constructions were used to gain a first insight into the make-up of basic degree constructions. All the subsequent crosslinguistic studies rely on the information about the morphological markers involved and the structure of simple comparative sentences that were analysed in this study.

1.2. Beck, Oda and Sugisaki (2004)

A second example is the work of Beck, Oda & Sugisaki (2004) who point out that the traditional degree-based analysis can not explain crucial Japanese data pertaining to comparative structures. Beck et al. propose a semantic analysis of comparison constructions in Japanese different from the standard semantics of comparatives as developed for English and related languages. The difference lies in the strategies that the two languages employ in constructing comparatives. For example, the fact that the syntactically provided item of comparison (the construction accompanying yori which is a concessive marker) does not, in contrast to an English than-clause, have a degree semantics (since it ultimately contributes an individual from which the real comparison has to be inferred) has led Beck, Oda & Sugisaki to argue that Japanese does not have English-style degree operators. It was also suggested that there is no predication of degrees formed in the main clause either and that Japanese does not have abstraction over degrees in the syntax, and is thus unable to create degree predicates that are not the meanings of lexical items.

Yori-constructions are semantically and syntactically very much unlike English-than comparatives and behave differently due to the pragmatic element in their interpretation (resulting in variation in acceptability) and the non-degree nature of the yori-construction (resulting in lack of subcomparatives of degree and absence of degree-related negative island effects).⁴

(7) a. How smart is John?

b. John-wa dore-kurai kasikoi no?

John-Top which degree smart Q

To which degree is John smart?

(Beck, Oda, & Sugisaki, 2004)

As seen in the examples, the subcomparative is ruled out in Japanese, and the degree question is a paraphrase.

In order to account for these empirical differences, Beck, Oda and Sugisaki (2004) proposed a parameter as the point of crosslinguistic variation between Japanese and English:

(8) Degree Abstraction Parameter (DAP):

A language {does/does not} have binding of degree variables in the syntax.

The setting of this parameter will determine a set of properties for a language: (non-)existence of subcomparatives of degree, degree-related negative island effects, scope in variation in comparatives, and genuine degree constructions for questions and the like. The prediction is that these properties will show up in a cluster, since they are all governed by the setting of one parameter.

Despite the fact that further investigation is needed to show if the generalization from comparatives to all degree constructions in Japanese is correct, Beck, Oda and Sugisaki's proposal was a starting point for future research of other languages as well.

1.3. Beck et al. (2009)

In fact, both the work of Sassen (1985) and of Beck, Oda & Sugisaki (2004) lie at the foundation of the parameters proposed in a more recent typological survey of comparative constructions, namely Beck et al. (2009)⁵. Moreover, the subtle differences between the Indo-European languages with respect to comparatives as proposed in Reglero (2007) has lead Beck et al. (2009) to investigate Bulgarian, Russian, Hindi-Urdu, Romanian and Spanish, for the purpose of contrasting them with English and German (which was argued to be identical to English for the purpose of their study).

The overall goal has been an in-depth study of the 14 languages analysed, with the perspective of figuring out how their grammars differ in order to yield the diverse empirical picture that comparisons present across languages.

In order to achieve this, a questionnaire has been designed to test a set of core data that was translated in each language. The questionnaire has two parts. In the first, more general part, the availability and expression of various comparison constructions (comparative, equative, superlative, etc.) was tested. The focus of the investigation was not only on the form of the relevant comparison construction, but also on whether its interpretation is English-like or not. The goal of this part was to get an impression of the systematicity of degree constructions in the syntax and semantics of a language.

The second part of the questionnaire was a study of the grammar of comparatives, which are considered to be the most studied and best analysed degree constructions in English and in other languages as well. This part included data like different comparatives, subcomparatives and comparison with a degree, which helped to determine whether a language has a degree semantics in the sense of a standard theory of comparison (in terms of von Stechow (1984)) and whether it confirms or disconfirms the parameter proposed in the work of Beck, Oda and Sugisaki (2004) mentioned above.

Finally, the questionnaire investigated syntactic possibilities in the realization of comparatives, for example, clausal and phrasal comparatives, adverbial and attributive comparatives in order to get an overview of the syntactic foundation for the expression of comparison from a crosslinguistic perspective.

The questionnaire included the following constructions: the positive (9), the comparative (10), the superlative (11), the equative (12), an attributive, an adverbial and clausal comparatives (in (13), (14) and (15)). All these constructions serve to get an idea of the syntactic options for the expression of comparatives.

(9) Positive?

Helo is tall.

(10) Comparative?

Mary is taller than Frank is.

(11) Superlative?

Helo is the tallest.

(12) Equative?

Sarabuk is as tall as Apollo is.

(13) Attributive Comparative?

Mr Bingley keeps more servants than Mr Bennet does.

(14) Adverbial Comparative?

Colonel Fitzwilliam behaved more amiably than his cousin did.

(15) Clausal Comparative?

Colonel Fitzwilliam behaved more amiably than I had expected.

In order to find out if the languages under investigation share the degree ontology that English makes use of, Beck et al. (2009) checked the availability of the following constructions in (16) illustrating a comparison with a degree (16a) and a different comparative (16b).

(16) a. Apollo is taller than 1.70 m. (CompDeg)

b. Helo is 8 cm taller than Sarabuk is. (Diff)

The next important issue investigated in the questionnaire comes from Beck, Oda and Sugisaki's (2004) proposals regarding crosslinguistic variation in the grammar of comparison, specifically the DAP under (8).

Beck et al. argue that English has the positive setting of the DAP while Japanese has the negative setting. If a language has the negative setting of the DAP, it means that will not have degree questions (17a), measure phrases (17b) and subcomparatives (17c), just like Japanese. It would also mean that the data that appear to be composites have a different analysis from English composites.

(17) a. Degree Question (DegQ):

How tall is the Apollo?

b. Measure Phrase (MP):

The Apollo is exactly 1.74 m tall.

c. Subcomparative (Sub):

Her shoes are longer than this cupboard is deep.

On the basis of the differences observed, the following three parameters of language variation were proposed (Beck et al., 2009):

(18) a. Degree Semantics Parameter (DSP):

A language {does/does not} have gradable predicates (type <d, <c, >> and related), i.e. lexical items that introduce degree arguments.

b. Degree Abstraction Parameter (DAP) (Beck, Oda & Sugisaki, 2004):

A language {does/does not} have binding of degree variables in the syntax.

c. Degree Phrase Parameter (DegPP):

The degree argument position of a gradable predicate {may/may not} be overtly filled.

The first parameter concerns the question of whether or not a language's grammar has incorporated scales into the meanings of gradable predicates. The second parameter differentiates between languages that allow quantification over degrees in the syntax and those that do not. Finally, the third is a syntactic parameter that concerns options for syntactically filling the degree argument position of a gradable predicate.

Thus, languages could be grouped according to whether they exhibit a negative or a positive setting of these parameters.

The question we are concerned with is where Romanian stands in this picture. Once the questionnaire data in Romanian was analysed, it has led to the conclusion that Romanian is very similar to (yet not like) English⁶. The differences were based on a relatively superficial constraint on the appearance of degree phrases in the Spec position of an AP, a position that may only be filled under restricted syntactic circumstances. This will be the starting point of our analysis of comparative constructions in Romanian.

So, the next step in developing a comparative theory of comparison should be a more in-depth investigation of the language properties based on the crosslinguistic research that was briefly presented in this chapter. It should lead to interesting conclusions regarding how the grammar of languages formally differs.

2. Romanian Comparative Constructions

Taking into consideration the potential differences in syntax and semantics, we try to develop an analysis of Romanian comparative constructions for the purpose of Contrasting them with English. Romanian patterns with English as far as the typological parameters proposed in Sassen (1985) are concerned or, at least, it does not seem to show any unusual type of comparison strategy. However, once we take into consideration the more thorough investigation proposed in Beck et al. (2009), it differs slightly in the syntactic realisation of degree constructions in general. Gergel (2009) suggests that the differences mainly concern the binding of degree variables in particular, since this is subject to a visibility constraint in Romanian – supporting the view that there is something special about degree variable binding in this language. Moreover, Dornilescu (2008, 2009) also points out some interesting facts related to the syntactic properties of comparative constructions in Romanian, with a special view on DegPs.

All these differences open up the possibility to undertake a more detailed investigation of comparison constructions in Romanian so that to provide not only useful insight on the nature of comparison, but also on the syntactic and semantic points of variation.

2.1. Points of variation

Based on the cross-linguistic data, it is argued that if a language has a Deg-head, one expects such phenomena as the following: (a) Deg-questions, (b) subcomparative structures, and (c) comparatives behaving uniformly in the language (Beck et al., 2009):

- (19) a. Degree Question (DegQ)
 How tall is un Apolo?
 b. Measure Phrase (MP)
Un Apolo is exactly 1.74 m tall.
 c. Subcomparative (Sub)
 Helo's shoes are longer than this cupboard is deep.

As previously mentioned, in English structures like those under (19) are possible, whereas in Japanese the same structures are not grammatical. Romanian seems to be a language that is parametrically intermediate, being sensitive to largely the same configurations which are conspicuous in the Japanese/English split. More specifically, the degree constructions in Romanian were considered to share some of the unwelcome consequences (for a standard analysis) evidenced by Japanese. Examining the data in Romanian, it has been observed that subcomparatives, measure phrases and degree questions are only possible with the addition of the morpheme de.

Gergel (2009) points out the following puzzling effects:

2.1.1. Degree Questions

The first problem encountered is that Romanian does not have simplex degree questions (i.e. degree questions obtained by simply merging the relevant items from a numeration and doing the necessary movement/operations, as for instance in English). Merging an appropriate wh-word to a declarative structure fails, as in (19a). Moreover, controlling for potentially interfering movement does not yield grammatical structures either [cf. (19b) through (19f)].

- (19) a. * $\hat{\nu}$ $\hat{\alpha}$ Ion e in \downarrow cligen \downarrow ? d. * $\hat{\nu}$ $\hat{\alpha}$ \downarrow Bn in \downarrow digen \downarrow e?
 b. * $\hat{\nu}$ $\hat{\alpha}$ \downarrow n \downarrow digen \downarrow e Ion ? e. * $\hat{\nu}$ $\hat{\alpha}$ in \downarrow cligen \downarrow Ion e?
 f. * $\hat{\nu}$ $\hat{\alpha}$ \downarrow c in \downarrow digen \downarrow Bn? f. * $\hat{\nu}$ $\hat{\alpha}$ \downarrow eIon in \downarrow digen \downarrow ?
 WH Ion is in \downarrow digen \downarrow
How intelligent is Ion?

2.1.2. Subcomparatives

The same is true of subcomparatives, that is, a simple Merge strategy of the usual lexical items does not yield the results usually expected. Merging two degree-based causes does not yield a well-formed subcomparative. Sentence (20) illustrates this fact.

- (20) *Raf \downarrow ul e(s \downarrow) mai lung de \downarrow la \downarrow mera e la \downarrow .
 shelf.the is more long than room.the is wide
 The shelf is longer than the room is wide.

Gergel (2009) argues that even if we change the word order (a strategy that was used to yield grammatical examples in Spanish in Reglero (2007)), the result does not seem grammatical.

- (21) *Raf \downarrow ul e(s \downarrow) mai lung de \downarrow la \downarrow la \downarrow e(s \downarrow) \downarrow mera.
 shelf.the is more long than wide is room.the

2.2. Little “de”

However, despite the apparent deficiencies observed earlier, there is a morphosyntactically well-motivated strategy used in the language (i.e., Merge of a little word), which salvages the problematic derivations. More specifically, the overmorphological form de is merged to the gradable adjective and saves the derivations, that is, degree questions and subcomparatives examined above.

Gergel (2009) suggests that the overmorpheme de is inserted/merged to the Deg position and marks it as such (22).

- (22) DegP
 Deg AP
 Absolu \downarrow e de \downarrow Ø A ...

With “little” de merged, degree questions are grammatical, as in (23a) and in the pied-piping variants illustrated in (23b) (cf. Grosu, 1994).

- (23) a. Țăcătoarea e mai inteligentă decât băieții.
 how is DE in<dligen< bn?
 How in<dligen< s Ion?
 b. Țăcătoarea e mai inteligentă decât Ion.
 how DE in<dligen< is Ion?
 How in<dligen< s Ion?

The same repair effect obtains in subcomparatives. In fact, the existence of subcomparatives, as of degree questions, has previously been noted in the literature (Grosu, 1994), but no reference was made to the role played by de.

Subcomparative structures in Romanian improve, however, under a set of conditions: subject-verb inversion and the insertion of de.

- (24) Maria e cu mult mai deșteaptă decât Zamfira de frumoasă.
 Maria is with much more clever.F than is Zamfira DE beautiful.FEM
 Maria is far cleverer than Zamfira is beautiful.

(Grosu, 1994)

- (25) Raftul e(să) mai lung decât e(să) camera de la.
 shelf.the is more long than is room.the DE wide
 The shelf is longer than the room is wide

- (26) Stalpul e mai înalt decât e groapa de adâncă.
 pole.D is more tall than is hole.D DE deep
 'The pole is taller than the hole is deep.'

(Gergel, 2010)

While there is a series of factors involved in such examples, they are syntactically of a relevant sort, and the reported examples involve the morpheme de.

Conclusions

- The Romanian adjective does not seem to invariably “project up” by itself (cf. the status of simplex degree question and subcomparatives)
- Romanian behaves neither like Japanese nor like English (while it is sensitive to the setting that distinguishes the two)
- Romanian shows a particular grammaticalized type of degree constructions: the insertion of the morpheme de;
- de-Merge is a last resort operation that salvages the structures analysed (it is in this sense that Romanian shows certain effects of degree binding over by).

NOTES

¹ Among the most important, we mention the typological works on comparison of Sassen (1985), Grosu (1994), Beck, Oda and Sugisaki (2004), Reglero (2007), Kennedy (2008), Beck et al. (2009), Shimoyama (2011) and (2012).

- ² Beck, Oda & Sugisaki (2004) have proposed a parameter of crosslinguistic variation that distinguishes Japanese from English; Beck et al. (2009) present and analyze parallel sets of data on comparison constructions from 14 languages, among which they also included Romanian.
- ³ Definition: a construction in a natural language to un- as a comparative construction if the construction has a semantic function of assigning a graded (i.e. non-identical) position on a predicative scale to two (possibly complex) objects (Sassen, 1985: 24).
- ⁴ Based on these differences, Beck, Oda & Sugisaki (2004) suggest that yaori-clauses do not describe degrees at all but are essentially relative clause-like (a free relative DP that non-attributes an individual, but no degree or degrees, see also Shimoyama, 2011 and 2012).

ABSTRACT: An 18th century physician's discourse on cancer: Traité sur le Vice Cancéreux ('Essay on cancer vice') by Dupré de Lisle (1774). Enunciative and lexical analysis

In Traité sur le Vice Cancéreux ('Essay on cancer vice'), Dupré de Lisle, Doctor of Medicine, personal physician of "Monseigneur le Duc de Provence", author of several works on medicine, delivers a study of cancer. He defines the illness, its causes and the ways of fighting it. Observations of patients are also included in the essay. This communication focuses on studying the discourse used in this treatise and the enunciative posture assumed by the physician writer. By highlighting the characteristics of the 18th century language used in this opus, with a particular attention on the vocabulary, it will be shown how the scientific discourse mixes with ethical, didactical and moral aspects.

KEYWORDS: Linguistic, enunciation, lexis, discourse analysis, cancer

Introduction

L'ouvrage de Dupré de Lisle, Traité sur le vice cancéreux, s'inscrit dans le contexte du XVIII^e qui voit sous l'impulsion des Lumières (Hazard, 1946), les progrès des sciences et de la médecine et « le rajeunissement de la perception médicale, l'illumination vive des couleurs et des choses sous le regard des premiers cliniciens » (Foucault, 1963) et « un regard millénaire s'est arrêté sur la souffrance des hommes » (Ibidem : 9). Les découvertes faites en physiologie et en biologie transforment peu à peu l'exercice de la médecine. Cependant les thérapeutiques restent très empiriques ou bien se débarrassent progressivement des médications fanaisées. En revanche, la chirurgie, elle, connaît une véritable ascension.

Par ailleurs, le XVIII^e reste traversé encore par de redoutables épidémies de peste, de variole et de typhus qui focalisent l'attention. Dans le même temps, le cancer, considéré comme une maladie redoutable et aux causes mal connues, est également un sujet abordé dans les journaux de médecine et les traités scientifiques. Les médecins s'interrogent sur son origine, étendent leurs connaissances et leurs expériences pour comprendre son évolution et progresser dans les moyens de le soigner. De fait le cancer, connu depuis l'antiquité, est terrifiant.

Il est dans ce texte que nous nous sommes intéressée aux caractéristiques linguistiques du Traité du Vice cancéreux de Dupré de Lisle, discours scientifique médical du XVIII^e siècle qui déballe abondamment les connaissances sur le cancer. Nous montrons que l'analyse de la langue peut apporter à sa compréhension². Nous avons souhaité particulièrement souligner que l'auteur, homme de sciences, formé par son cursus aux Belles Lettres, adopte la posture énonciative d'un médecin impliqué dans son écrit ayant foi dans le progrès scientifique et en l'homme, et ouvre aux évolutions de la pensée, à la progression de la réflexion théorique. Il associe les définitions sur le cancer et les observations sur les malades. Par ailleurs, les aspects techniques et médicaux qu'il croise avec les considérations morales et spirituelles.

Dans ce discours tenu sur le cancer, émerge donc, avec des procédés lexicaux, syntaxiques et stylistiques propres, un genre de discours qui nous présente des caractéristiques spécifiques scientifiques, techniques et didactiques, n'ignore pas non plus les observations morales et subjectives avec des prises en charge énonciatives qu'évite le discours de l'insémination médicale du XXI^e siècle (Lozachmeur, 2010). Un ethos de l'homme de sciences, médecin du XVIII^e se constitue.

1. Traité sur le vice cancéreux de Dupré de Lisle : un discours sur le cancer

Si le discours de Dupré de Lisle lié au texte du XVIII^e siècle, mêlé aux développements scientifiques médicaux des considérations d'ordre humanisme et moral, ces traits de famille de discours s'observent également dans le manuscrit de Deslongchamps objet d'une étude précédente³. Appréhender les textes de cette période permet donc de saisir in fine la culture propre à l'homme de sciences, ce que Beaulieu (2002 : 367 et 1988 : 37) a présenté avec le concept de « matrice discursive » :

On appelle matrice discursive la somme de ces traits communs ou largement partagés qui caractérisent un ensemble de textes qui sont alors posés comme relevant d'un même discours, entendu restrictivement comme cadre, à valeur modalisante, donc procédant à des degrés de conformité variables, les textes observables en train dans une même série.

1.1. L'auteur

L'ouvrage de Dupré de Lisle, écrit en 1774, intitulé Le Traité sur le Vice cancéreux est publié chez le libraire, Libraire Quai des Augustins. Il reçoit l'approbation du roi en décembre 1772 et comprend deux volumes. Le 1^{er} volume comporte 347 pages réparties en deux parties : la première compte 6 chapitres et la deuxième, 3 chapitres. Le 2^e en 382 pages compte 6 chapitres.

Dupré de Lisle est d'abord médecin au départemen de la Marine et de la Prévôté de l'Hôtel du roi. En 1774, il est médecin du comté de Provence. Outre le Traité sur le Vice cancéreux, il a publié quelques ouvrages : Traité des Lésions de la tête, par contre-coup, et des conséquences pratiques (1770) et du Traité des maladies de la poitrine connues sous le nom de Phtisie pulmonaire (1769). Dissertation académique sur la fièvre miliaire des femmes en couche (1779).

Le Traité sur le Vice cancéreux est présenté en décembre 1774 par le Journal de Médecine, Chirurgie, Pharmacie qui résume l'apport de l'ouvrage au diagnostic et au traitement du Cancer. Après avoir souligné une liste de petites erreurs et maladresses (« On a peine à pardonner à un auteur qui paroît avoir une lecture vaste & étendue, une foule de méprises plus singulières les unes que les autres » (Roux, 1774 : 503)), l'auteur de l'article, A. Roux, Docteur-Régent et ancien Professeur de Pharmacie de la Faculté de Médecine de Paris, Membre de l'Académie Royale des Belles-Lettres, Sciences & Arts de Bordeaux, & de la Société Royale d'Agriculture de la Généralité de Paris, conclut : « Mais malgré ces défauts que l'auteur peut corriger aisément dans une seconde édition, son ouvrage nous a paru mériter l'attention des praticiens. » (Ibidem)

1.2. Le titre

Le titre du Traité sur le vice cancéreux appelle une précision d'ordre lexicologique. En effet le mot « vice », pour désigner le cancer n'est pas habituel en français contemporain. Il est issu du latin classique « viciū » « défaut physique », puis « défaut » en général, « faute, vice », « violence commise, viol » et dans la langue des augures, « présage défavorable fourni par un animal qui présente des défauts » (Rey, 2004 : s.v.). Le mot n'a pas d'étymologie bien trévue. Il est la valeur de « défaut » dans le domaine moral, matériel, qui est passée en français ; le sens de « défaut grave que réprouve la morale » est alors opposé à « vertu ». Le mot désigne ensuite une disposition habituelle au mal, à des passions mauvaises. Une autre valeur est apparue au XII^e, aujourd'hui disparue : celle de reproche. Depuis le XII^e, « vice » s'est aussi dit d'une mauvaise action, puis d'un crime. Une autre valeur ancienne est « piège, ruse », présente dans « avoir du vice » pour « être malin, rusé ».

Le vice, au XVII^e, désigne par métonymie l'ensemble des personnes qui ont un ou des vices. À la même époque, le sens ancien de « défaut moral grave » s'est restreint aux dérèglements de la conduite, notamment sexuelle (débauchée). Le nom a aussi une application en droit sans jugement moral pour une imperfection grave qui rend une chose ou une personne plus ou moins impropre à sa destination (un vice). Enfin, on retrouve cette idée d'imperfection, appliquée d'abord aux personnes et aux choses concrètes dans « vice facté », « vice de raisonnement », « vice de forme », « vice de construction », « vice rédhibitoire », « vice de prononciation » et en médecine dans « vice de conformation » ; « conformation » est pris au sens de disposition des parties d'un corps animé, d'un organe. Il est aussi au XIX^e que l'application morale du nom évolue, un vice désigne une mauvaise habitude qu'on ne peut réprimer et aussi une perversion sexuelle.

Dans le titre du traité de Dupré de Lisle, le mot « vice » s'applique à la maladie du cancer et l'envisage comme une imperfection, un défaut dans la conformation physique, quelque chose qui vient perturber le fonctionnement normal de l'organisme. Il est un mot qui connaît le mal, comme à l'origine quand il désignait un présage défavorable. Du reste, le titre est complété par un développement secondaire mais explicatif du contenu :

Adelon (1834) dans l'entrée « cancéreux » du dictionnaire revient sur l'utilisation du terme « vice » :

Il s'agit d'une maladie chronique, et une fois développée, elle enferme en elle-même le principe de son développement ultérieur, c'est une affection spécifique, qui est dans un rapport particulier avec une affection constitutionnelle. Nos devanciers exprimaient la même idée quand ils disaient que le cancéreux était l'effet du vice cancéreux. Vice la veut forte et dure, maladie spécifique, lequel a signifie un je ne sais quoi qui échappe, mais dont l'esprit ne peut nier l'existence.

(Lidat, in Adelon, 1834 / 306)

1.3. Une étude sur le cancer

Le cancéreux est une préoccupation ancienne des médecins et des chirurgiens. Il s'agit à Hippocrate et son école que l'on doit le nom de crabe ou pince (Carcinos) ; les veines se développent autour de la tumeur évoquant les pattes d'un crabe. Le squirrhe ou « cancéreux dur » est la première étape du cancéreux. Au XVI^e siècle, au nom de l'expérience et de la raison, Paracelse s'élève avec véhémence contre la théorie des humeurs utilisée pour expliquer le cancéreux. Et plus tard le Dictionnaire universel de Furetière témoigne des interrogations médicales de son époque sur le cancéreux. Furetière donne ainsi à l'entrée « cancéreux » la définition de Striplive suivante :

Cancre. S.m. Terme de médecine. Il s'agit d'une maladie qui vient dans les chairs, & qui les mange peu à peu comme une espèce de cancre. Il s'agit d'une tumeur dure, inégale, raboteuse, ronde & immobile, de couleur tendrée, livide ou plombine, environnée de plusieurs veines apparentes & durcies, pleines d'un sang melancolique & limoneux, qui ressemblent au poisson appelée cancer ou écrevisse. Elle commence sans douleur, & paroît d'abord comme un poichon ou une petite noisette ; mais elle croît assez vite, & devient fort douloureuse. Les cancers viennent aux parties glanduleuses & lâches, comme aux mamelles & aux ementouères. En grec karkinos, qui signifie aussi écrevisse. Ce mal a grand rapport avec le sort de poisson, en ce que quand une fois il a pris pied dans un corps, il est presque impossible de l'en chasser, de même qu'il est difficile d'arracher des pinces de l'écrevisse que qu'elle a une fois attrapé.

Il en résulte des connaissances sur le cancéreux déjà répertoriées depuis l'antiquité, notamment le caractère incurable et l'évolution inexorable de la maladie (Rouëssé, 2011) et le rapport de ressemblance avec l'écrevisse (plus tard le crabe).

L'utilisation, au milieu du XIX^e siècle, du microscope connu depuis le XVII^e, fait progresser l'étude du cancéreux, maladie vue comme affreuse, fatale, rapidement proliférante dans le tissu humain, rupture de l'équilibre harmonieux du corps idéal sain, symbole de moralité. Au milieu du XIX^e siècle, les médecins consacrent une augmentation des cas de cette pathologie devant laquelle la médecine est désarmée, ce qui accroît l'effroi éprouvé à son évolution. M. Foucauld décrit des savoirs qu'ils voient avec « la chimère, la rêverie et la pure monstruosité » (Foucauld, 1971 : 22-23) ce qui peut s'appliquer aux études sur le cancer au XVIII^e siècle, ainsi que le livre de Dupré de Lisle témoigne des hésitations médicales et de l'horreur subie par les patients. L'ouvrage a été d'abord une chirurgie des tumeurs dans des conditions effroyables pour le patient et cela dit à la fin du XVIII^e siècle, les médecins sont encore paralysés sur les effets et l'importance des connaissances physiologiques, valorisées par beaucoup de chirurgiens. La réflexion progresse et au XVIII^e siècle, les chirurgiens (Le Dran, Dampier, notamment) font la description de la dissémination métastatique. En 1773, au moment où Dupré de Lisle écrit son traité, l'Académie des Sciences, Arts et Belles Lettres met à l'ordre du jour la question « Qu'est-ce que le cancer ? ». Le prix est remporté par Bernard Peyrilhe qui déclare dans sa dissertation académique :

« ... du sein de plusieurs maux, que le cancer pullule ordinairement; la chlorose⁵, le défaut ou la suppression des menstrues, le chagrin et la tristesse, les médiations longues et profondes, une vie molle et oisive, et comme au commencement de l'épaississement de la lymphe, le son aussi de donner naissance au cancer⁶. »

Le XVIII^e voit se développer les théories vitalistes pour lesquelles l'être humain n'est pas seulement une « machine » mais soumis à une âme raisonnable ; théorie supposant une intervention du psychisme dans le développement des cancers alors que la méthode anatomique recherche les faits et les classifications. Face aux problèmes de l'expérimentation qui en découlent, Danguilhem (1968 : 386) rappelle que pour Kant la faculté de médecine appartient aux facultés supérieures comme le droit et la rhétorique : « En effet, le médecin est un « artiste » et comme tel il doit utiliser un savoir par lequel il dépend non seulement de sa propre Faculté, mais aussi de la Faculté de philosophie⁷. » Pour Danguilhem (1968) « L'histoire des sciences n'est pas une science et son objet n'est pas un objet scientifique. Faire, au sens le plus opératif du terme, de l'histoire des sciences, est l'une des fonctions, non la plus aisée, de l'épistémologie philosophique. »

Il n'est pas question ici de faire l'histoire du cancer, ni de porter un jugement sur les connaissances que les hommes du XVIII^e en avaient mais de saisir la langue dont usent les scientifiques pour aborder la pathologie du cancer, à partir du Traité sur le Vice Cancéreux, et de la problématique humaine douloureuse inhérente à toute décision médicale, confrontés qu'ils étaient au manque de moyens en médecine (analgésiques, anesthésiques) et en mode d'exploration. La médecine du XVIII^e, comme toutes les techniques, déploie ses efforts pour dominer le milieu et organiser ses soins au service des vivants en utilisant les résultats des sciences. Dès lors, notre point de vue cherche à évaluer le discours que tient le médecin-chirurgien du XVIII^e sur ses pratiques, sur ses honneurs, et Dupré de Lisle fait au cancer qu'il définit comme un « vice ». D'ailleurs tel a se traduit dans le langage quand il s'agit de se forger une conviction, d'élaborer un diagnostic, de mettre en place un protocole de soin ?

Vu en diachronie le discours tenu dans le Traité du Vice cancéreux peut contribuer à envisager le développement et la maturation de la médecine cancérologique. Dans son langage, Dupré de Lisle fait partager ses connaissances, ses expériences, ses interrogations ainsi que ses recherches sur la maladie du cancer avec empathie pour le patient et soufi de partager son savoir et ses observations empiriques avec ses confrères. Ainsi en est-il au XXI^e où les publications sur le cancer abondent.

Dommenhan / Introduction à l'étude de la médecine expérimentale de Claude Bernard, Danguilhem (1968 / 128) rappelle :

Si l'on ne sait pas bien quel est le point de départ qui a dit que les livres ont leur destin, au moins est-il certain que l'une des tâches de l'historien des sciences est de s'interroger sur le destin, de rechercher s'il y en a ou non au contenu même de l'ouvrage, au sens des énoncés qu'il contient et à un certain rapport de sens à tel ou à d'autres travaux du même ordre, antérieurs, contemporains ou postérieurs, et enfin de se demander si le rapport de sens avec son avenir de durée, de renforcement éventuel, ou au contraire de dégradation en bruit pur et simple, a été ignoré, ou pressenti, ou expressément prévu par l'auteur même de l'ouvrage. L'influence d'un ouvrage est un type de relation entre le passé et le présent qui s'établit dans le sens rétrograde.

Si on s'interroge sur le destin du Traité sur le Vice cancéreux, donc Dupré de Lisle espérait qu'il fût « utile à l'humanité », on constate qu'il fait la synthèse des connaissances répertoriées sur le cancer depuis plusieurs siècles, pour proposer ensuite d'autres interprétations ou observations. Dans ce sens, on suppose que le livre destiné aux Écoles de Santé et aux collèges médicaux et chirurgiens de Dupré de Lisle, continue à être lu et recherché par les lecteurs au-delà de sa publication, et que son sens en est réactualisé.

Un autre intérêt de cet ouvrage est la réflexion constante de l'auteur faite aux choix thérapeutiques du médecin, sa crainte d'infliger des souffrances inutiles ; d'être à la limite de l'expérimentation dangereuse, ce qui préfigure les débats ouverts par Danguilhem (1968 / 384) :

La forme aujourd'hui la plus aiguë de la crise de la conscience médicale, c'est la diversité même l'opposition d'opinions relatives à l'allègement et au devoir du médecin, devant les possibilités thérapeutiques que lui offrent les résultats de la recherche en laboratoire, l'existence des antibiotiques et des vaccins, la mise au point d'interventions chirurgicales de resuscitation, de greffe ou de prothèse, l'application à l'organisme des corps radioactifs. Le public des malades réels ou possibles souhaite à la fois l'aide en thérapeutique [...] Quoi d'étonnant si l'homme moderne appréhende confusément à tort ou à raison, que la médecine en vienne à le déposséder, sous l'ouïe de le servir, de son existence organique propre et de la responsabilité qu'il pense lui revenir dans les décisions qui en concernent le cours.

Dupré de Lisle, pour sa part prend « le parti de l'homme » (Danguilhem, 1968 / 385), c'est-à-dire le recours à la morale humanisée représentée par la radiologie hippocratique et force de son apologie de la clinique et de l'éthique. En ce sens, il est proche de la médecine cancérologique actuelle qui place la qualité de vie du patient au cœur de nombreux projets. (Colomba, 2014) Dans le cas de l'ampoulation appliquée au cancer du sein, les médecins de l'Ancien régime, comme Guillaume de Houpeville, témoignent de leurs réticences, mais leur semble une souffrance insupportable sans hésitation et sans la certitude d'un bénéfice :

Quand j'ai pensé à l'exécuter [l'opération], je suis demeuré en suspens par l'horreur que m'inspirait l'exécution de la douleur qu'elle devait causer, la perte de sang, et enfin la crainte de récidive [du cancer]. La crainte augmentait par la lecture de Galien et de Mercurius qui assurent que les cancéreux empiraient après l'application du feu et après les avoir coupés.

Certains médecins rapportent les cas de patients devant solliciter elles-mêmes l'intervention du chirurgien. On le voit bien, « soigner c'est faire une expérience. » (Anguilhem, 1968 : 389) Il semble que cette désignation soit par conséquent difficile pour le médecin du XVIII^e siècle et que sa morale et sa subjectivité soient mises à l'épreuve. Anguilhem qui rappelle que les médecins ont toujours expérimenté (Hippocrate le dit pour son époque et avant lui), souligne les exigences intellectuelles et morales que cela suppose :

Mais comme on loue Bernard, ni d'ailleurs qui que ce soit d'autre, ne peut dire à l'avance où passe la limite entre le noyau, l'innocent et le bienfaisant, comme cette limite peut varier d'un malade à l'autre, que tout médecin se dise et fasse savoir qu'en médecine on n'expérimente, c'est-à-dire on ne soigne, qu'en tremblant. Mieux, une médecine soumise de l'homme dans sa singularité de vivant ne peut être qu'une médecine qui expérimente.

(Ibidem : 389)

Ces aspects très prégnants dans le discours de Dupré de Lisle soulignent notre intérêt pour les aspects moraux et subjectifs du Traité sur le Vice cancéreux, parallèlement au discours technique, scientifique, savant et assis sur le cancer.

1.4. Apport de l'analyse du discours pour le Traité sur le Vice cancéreux

Parallèlement à une contextualisation dans le XVIII^e siècle, il s'agit dans cette étude de mener une analyse du discours, dans une extension large et langagière et de replacer l'activité scientifique dans un cadre social, pour poser la façon dont le sens du texte est produit. Notre réflexion s'inscrit dans le cadre de la notion de discours appelée par Pierre Fiala (2014 : 109) :

Le terme discours, employé anciennement avec une valeur extensive englobant des manifestations multiples de la parole, s'est spécialisé à l'âge classique pour désigner l'expression verbale, écrite ou orale, de la pensée maîtrisée par la raison et l'art oratoire. La linguistique structurale a précédé, d'une part la définition du discours en le liant à l'ordre de langue et aux conditions de l'énonciation et, d'autre part, élargi son extension aux diverses réalisations de la parole, prises pour objet d'observation par les sciences humaines et sociales.

Dans cette perspective, il s'agit de réfléchir à ce qui se travaille sur les bords discursifs de la langue (Pêcheux, 1981). Branca (2002) montre que le concept de « matérialité discursive » de Pêcheux (1969) qui refonde l'objection discursive pose le problème de « la frontière entre linguistique et discours ». La linguistique décrit et interprète des faits de langue et J.-M. Marandin donne comme point de départ cette distinction : « Le discours est une séquence de phrases dans une langue naturelle, la linguistique décrit les phrases d'une langue naturelle. » (Marandin, 1979 : 18), ce qui l'amène à opposer deux modes decriptions : « La description d'une langue vise à fournir les règles permettant de construire toute phrase de la langue, alors que l'objet d'une analyse de discours, dans une première approximation, semble être de décrire une séquence réelle unique et non répétée. » (Ibidem : 18)

Par ailleurs, l'analyse du discours prenant comme objet la question du sujet elle permet d'aborder la description du sujet énonciatif selon les places qu'il occupe dans l'énonciement discursif. Cette analyse, menée sur un texte comme le Traité du Vice cancéreux est en prise à la fois sur la langue et sur l'histoire des sciences. Le sujet prend place, en effet, dans des dispositifs historiques et l'interprétation des rapports entre marques et positions énonciatives doit tenir compte de la conscience linguistique de cette époque.

Les éléments de cette réflexion sur les objectifs de l'analyse du discours sont utiles pour faire émerger des traits significatifs et interprétables dans un répertoire de textes ayant des spécificités propres au XVIII^e siècle et le discours sur la médecine, le corps malade. L'analyse de cet objet discursif se donne des « instruments » qui sont les processus mémoriels extérieurs et les processus sémantiques pris dans des relations d'interdiscours, et pour reprendre une idée fréquente, les « outils » linguistiques, sans que pour autant la linguistique soit ramenée strictement à cette dimension mais plutôt parce qu'elle veut se donner des terrains d'observation bien circonscrits et notamment les régularités syntaxiques pour interpréter les énoncés à partir des formes de la langue : unités lexicales, unités syntaxiques, des faits de discours aussi bien sémantiques, énonciatifs qu'interprétatifs.

Nous prenons « objet discursif » au sens donné par Moirand (2002) « une entité constitutivement discursive se déployant à la fois dans l'intradiscours et dans l'interdiscours ». Moirand (2002) appuie sur l'apport de Séri (1998) pour cette notion inscrite dans l'analyse du discours à la française et qui cherche à faire émerger les « points de surgissement des objets de discours » et « leurs transformations au fil du discours » :

Ons lit de discours et dans le discours – discours où il naît et se développe mais aussi discours dont il garde la mémoire – il est par là même, élan donné la manière dont nous concevons le discours, pris dans la matérialité de la langue. La notion d'objet de discours apparaît alors précieusement comme un moyen d'observer l'articulation entre catégories de langue et catégories discursives.

Rappelons que l'analyse de Fiala (1991) qui traduit la complexité d'une entreprise où les évidences intellectuelles et les pratiques argumentatives ne suffisent pas mais doivent se combiner avec les approches énonciatives, syntaxiques et lexicales :

Même doté d'instruments informatiques puissants – mémoire non limitée, analyseurs syntaxiques, moyens de calculs et de présentation des résultats enrichis –, l'analyse du discours ne saurait être une méthode du prêt-à-interpréter, toujours disponible pour les sciences humaines et sociales. Elle implique une construction propre, des hypothèses, une problématique autonome. Le discours ne s'offre pas même un produit fini à interpréter – lecture, conversation –, il doit être en permanente reconstruction même événementielle comme structure, comme lieu de mémoire interdiscursive, élément dans des réseaux d'archives, comme événement de séquences et comme réseaux d'associations, comme lieu de miroitements lexicaux, morphologiques et sémantiques, comme jeux de plates énonciatives traversant le sujet comme pratique associée à des plates et des situations.

2. Les caractères du discours médical au XVIII^e siècle

Dupré de Lisle écrivait un discours qui se veut enthousiaste sur les progrès de la science, à l'intention de ses collègues médecins et traduit les préoccupations de sa profession :

Si dans un siècle nos cendres pouvoient se ranimer, nous verrions régner des sciences dont nous n'avons pas même la plus légère idée aujourd'hui. Les trésors de la nature sont inépuisables, & la vie de l'homme est trop courte. Ne regrettons point que nous ne soyons ceux qui nous ont précédés, & n'envions point à nos descendants ce qu'ils pourront acquiescer de plus.

Il manifeste également une grande humilité à l'égard des travaux des chercheurs du passé, tout en portant des jugements moraux sur les recherches que l'homme pense avoir, ce dont témoignent des expressions comme « inondé le monde », « foule de systèmes », « les erreurs les plus absurdes » dans l'extrait suivant. Au XVIII^e siècle, la conscience est vive que la médecine s'occupe d'un objet bien compliqué, qu'elle est une connaissance incertaine (Foucault, 1963), mais ces considérations confuses opéreront un retournement pour ouvrir à des principes mesurables :

Telle est la médecine et ses phénomènes sont en grand nombre, des mystères. On pourroit la comparer à ces champs dont les parties les plus raboteuses sont entore à défricher ; soit que cela vienne de la nature qui, comme nous l'avons déjà dit, a voulu se ménager le soin de nourrir notre industrie, prévenir notre indolence ; soit que ce soit un vice de l'orgueil de l'homme qui s'imagine avoir approfondi ce qu'il n'a fait qu'effleurer. Un autre obstacle au progrès des sciences & de l'esprit humain vient de ce que les philosophes se sont attachés plutôt à deviner la nature qu'à l'étudier. Delà cette foule de systèmes qui ont inondé le monde, & ont édifiés les erreurs les plus absurdes.

Il est d'ailleurs intéressant de noter en parallèle avec l'esprit qui préside à la création de l'Encyclopédie de Diderot élaborée entre 1748 et 1765 et qui est l'un des plus grands témoignages de l'art de l'esprit philosophique et où il s'agit d'exposer les connaissances humaines dans leur ordre et leur enchaînement. Diderot porte ce lien d'enthousiasme en insistant sur le fait que « l'homme est le terme unique d'où il faut partir, et auquel il faut tout ramener ».

D'entrée, Dupré de Lisle fait le point sur l'état des connaissances sur le cancer et donne un état descriptif de la situation : « Nous allons nous occuper du vice cancéreux. L'on sait qu'il est un des plus redoutables fléaux de l'humanité, & l'écueil de l'art. » (1774 : ix)

Cette maladie passe par bien des degrés avant qu'elle n'acquière toute la malignité dont elle est susceptible. L'humeur qui la produit, est de nature à rester longtemps assoupie avant d'entrer dans la fermentation putride. Les autres humeurs sont différentes, comme l'on verra par la suite de ce traité. Toute substance abandonnée à elle-même, doit rendre nécessairement à sa décomposition ; et est le premier acte qu'exerce la nature sur les corps susceptibles de la fermentation putride. Les fluides, en repos dans quelque partie de l'être physique, doivent par la même raison, subir le même sort ; ils commencent par exciter un mouvement qui désunit leur cohésion & leur union. Il n'est dans le premier abord, qu'une espèce de coagulation, à laquelle succède un frémissement que Boerhaave appelle mouvement spongieux. Dans ce cas, les parties s'en rapprochent & s'en éloignent tour à tour, par une espèce de bouillonnement ou d'effort qui s'exerce dans l'humeur en congélation. On peut regarder la putréfaction comme le dernier vœu de la nature. La seule existence d'un agrégé est un principe certain de sa destruction. Mais comme la nature est aussi ingénieuse que féconde dans ses productions, elle ne paraît détruire que pour créer de nouveau.

L'objectif affiché de Dupré de Lisle est bien de faire un état des recherches théoriques et expérimentales, un état sur les causes ainsi qu'un point sur les nouvelles thérapies.

Dans ce traité il ne sera seulement question que de la putréfaction cancéreuse, maladie des plus redoutables qui puisse le plus incommodes l'humanité. Nous allons développer les causes de ce vice d'angereux, qui nous conduisent à déterminer sa nature, ses différents caractères, ses effets dans les différents degrés, & la meilleure manière de le prévenir & de le détruire. Ensuite nous passerons dans un traitement par l'usage des tumeurs squirreuses & chancreuses qui peuvent se produire intérieurement dans les différents viscères, mais surtout de la phlogistique tuberculeuse.

2.1. Le jargon médical

Pour l'essentiel, le discours se situe dans le terrain technique comme en témoignent les termes techniques nous l'avons, termes médicaux ou chirurgicaux au fond, et l'ordonnement des parties du corps et aux manifestations de la maladie.

Ce vocabulaire se retrouve dans les textes de l'époque⁹ : « glandes », « vaisseaux excrétoires lymphatiques », « nerf », « ulcération », « verrue », « tumeur », « substance chancreuse », « humeur », « squirre », « grangrene », « mamelles des femmes », « oreilles », « nez », « levres », « yeux », « putréfaction », « uterus », « aisselles », « aines », « mésentere » (membrane formée par un repli du péri-oïne qui enveloppe l'intestin grêle).

Quelques mots, parmi ceux relevés dans le traité, sont sortis d'usage, comme par exemple le mot « porreau » :

Les cancrs des joues & des levres se manifestent ordinairement par une espèce de porreau, ou bien comme une petite tumeur dure, plus ou moins douloureuse.

(Ibidem, Tome 1 : 20)

Les premiers cancrs du nez) dans leur principe se présentent sous la forme d'un porreau accompagné d'une dureté douloureuse dans la base.

(Ibidem : 22)

Et le mot « porreau » est à comprendre au sens de « verrue ». Il semble issu du mot plus tard « porion » : poireau, verrue. Par analogie de forme, le mot « poireau », issu du vocabulaire de la botanique puis de la médecine vétérinaire, prend le sens « d'excroissance charnue chez un animal », de « verrue », mais aussi de « pénis ». Au XV^e siècle, il est une « verrue aux pieds des oiseaux. » (Rey, 2004 : 2819)

L'inflammation peut être érysipélateuse (peau rouge), œdémateuse ou squirreuse.

(Ibidem : 74)

Furetière (1690) donne le mot comme appartenant à la langue commune :

Poireau (ou Perreau) est aussi une espèce de verrue, ou excroissance de chair spongieuse qui vient aux pasderrière des chevaux, qui est grosse comme une noix, qui jette & qui suppure des eaux rousses & puantes.

Poireau, signifie aussi une verrue, ou excroissance qui vient sur la peau de l'homme par une petite écorchure. On dit que le lait de figuier, le suc de digitale, fait en aller les poireaux.

L'Encyclopédie de Diderot a des choses à dire sur ce mot. Le terme doit être également utilisé dans la langue médicale. Le Nouveau dictionnaire de médecine universelle et raisonnée, de Nicolas (1772, Tome 5) donne : « Porreau (chir) c'est une excroissance paroissant à peine au-dessus de la peau, d'ailleurs semblable à une verrue, & qui exige le même traitement. »

Par la suite, dans Adelon (1834), « porreau » n'apparaît plus et à la place de l'article « cancer » Littré, emploie le mot « verrue » : « A la peau le cancer commence par un tubercule auquel on a donné le nom de verrue. » (Littré in Adelon, 1834, Tome VI : 303)

2.2. Le regard

Les observations que Dupré de Lisle développe à partir de son expérience de la maladie repose, en grande partie, sur ses observations des signes de la maladie et des réactions des malades :

Je me rappelle avoir été consulté, il y a quelques années, pour une femme qui avoit depuis douze ans, une petite tumeur à la mamelle gauche. [...] J'en ai vu plusieurs cas semblables ; j'en ai vu d'autres qui n'ont jamais dégénéré en cancer, & les personnes, affectées de pareilles tumeurs, ont vécu très-long-temps, sans que leur vie ait été terminée par les horreurs de cette terrible maladie.

Concernant le cancer du sein par exemple, les études du XXI^e siècle soulignent que la découverte de la tumeur est le premier stade de son diagnostic¹⁰. Ce stade préliminaire est particulièrement prégnant chez Dupré de Lisle qui s'attache à observer le malade et les signes qu'il développe. De ce fait, à côté des verbes du communiaire scientifique comme « savoir », « trouver », « pouvoir + infinitif », le verbe « voir » et les mots du regard ont une place très importante.

« Voir » est pris au sens de « percevoir par la vue » (« on voit quelquefois des cancers qui contractent des duretés inégales, rondes, livides & douloureux » (1774 : 18), « on voit de même dans toute l'étendue du canal intestinal de petites cavités qui font comme des calotes revêtues de coton en dedans, ou d'une infinité de petits filamens qui s'élèvent dans toute la surface. », (Ibidem : 36) mais développe des valeurs figurées comme « percevoir par l'esprit », « juger », « examiner » (« nous verrions régner des sciences dont nous n'avons pas même la plus légère idée aujourd'hui » (1774 : vij), « On peut regarder la putréfaction comme le dernier vœu de la nature », (Ibidem : x)).

Lorsqu'il établit que l'incidence de la disposition storbue dans la masse des humeurs « peut par succession de temps, favoriser le vice cancéreux », il expose alors sa démarche de clinicien :

Cette indisposition est plus fréquente qu'on ne l'imagine ; elle ne se manifeste pas toujours par des symptômes ordinaires qui puissent frapper les yeux d'un praticien. Un homme insensé, ainsi que nous les pevisions, les confrontes souvent, pour les faire servir à la découverte de la maladie.

Soulignons ici l'emploi du mot « découverte » dans le sens de « action de trouver ce qui était ignoré et caché » (Rey, 2004 : 1012), de percevoir la réalité de la maladie.

Ce point de vue a été mis en évidence par Foucault (1963 : 153-174) qui rappelle ce préconisation de Dumas (1807) : « Démêler le principe et la cause d'une maladie à travers la confusion et l'obscurité des symptômes¹¹. »

Foucault (1963 : 129) insiste également sur le rapport du regard à la maladie au XVIII^e siècle, sur l'idée de maladie qui transparait dans les symptômes et les signes. C'est le fondement de la méthode clinique :

La clinique demande au médecin au regard que l'histoire naturelle. Au XVIII^e siècle jusqu'à un certain point la même chose : voir, isoler des faits, reconnaître ceux qui sont identiques et ceux qui sont différents, les regrouper, les classer par espèces ou familles. Le modèle naturaliste auquel le médecin se soumet pour une par soumission au XVIII^e siècle reste le même. Le vieux rêve de Boissier de Sauvages, être le Linné des maladies, n'est pas entré en compte et a été oublié au XIX^e siècle et les médecins ont continué à herboriser longtemps dans le champ du pathologique. Mais le regard médical s'organise, en outre, sur un mode nouveau. D'abord, il n'est plus simplement le regard de l'observateur, mais celui d'un médecin supporté et justifié par une institution, celui d'un médecin qui a pouvoir de décision et d'intervention. Ensuite, c'est un regard qui n'est pas lié par la grille étroite de la structure (forme, disposition, nombre, grandeur) mais qui peut saisir les couleurs, les variations, les infimes anomalies, se pencher toujours aux aguets du déviant. Enfin c'est un regard qui ne se contente pas de constater ce qui évidemment se donne à voir ; il doit permettre de dessiner les chances et les risques ; il est créateur.

En confrontant le texte de Dupré de Lisle aux Journaux de médecine et aux Dictionnaires de son époque, on constate que ce vocabulaire médical, condition essentielle de l'acte thérapeutique, est bien partagé avec la communauté scientifique. La maladie est visible et énonçable (« être vu » et « être parlé », Foucault, 1963 : 137). Les mots réfèrent à une réalité qui est perçue par accord de tous. Mais pour actualiser les caractères de la maladie, il faut « une incarnation matérielle dans des signes » (Bakhtine, 1977 : 28). La référence à la maladie est d'abord un consensus ; caractère social que Gaudin (2003 : 34) met en évidence :

L'acton de référence est interactive, dialogale, elle résulte des interactions. Référer suppose un accord dans la communauté. [...] Référer se situe donc dans la dynamique d'une visée référentielle au sein du dialogue, en faisant une co-construction du monde. Cette position permet d'expliquer à la fois le caractère flou des catégories dont nous convenons, puisque cette convention est toujours rejouée, et la souveraineté libérée que nous avons de façonner ces catégories selon des critères, toujours négociables.

Le vocabulaire technique médical se constitue comme base de dialogue, acte interactif, entre Dupré de Lisle et ses confrères médecins. L'existence et l'importance du Journal de Médecine, Chirurgie et pharmacie au XVIII^e siècle (t. 9) confirment d'ailleurs la nécessité des liens scientifiques pour la diffusion du savoir et pour l'organisation médicale.

Dans le champ de la clinique, le langage doit avoir un caractère collectif, exact, faire consensus pour qu'il y ait corrélation entre le regard accompagnant la description exhaustive des mots de la maladie.

La langue bien faite, en laquelle on dit ce que ses sœurs voyaient l'idéal de la connaissance scientifique, ne doit donc pas être cherchée comme l'on fait avec trop de hâte certains médecins du début d'une langue des saluts ; mais du côté de cette langue mesurée qui est à la fois à la mesure des choses qu'elle décrit et du langage dans lequel elle les décrit.

Foucault (1963 : 164) pointe le caractère mythique de ce « œil qui parlerait » :

On comprend comment au jour de ces thèmes, un certain ésotérisme médical a pu se rétablir après le rêve révolutionnaire d'une science et d'une pratique absolument ouvertes : on ne voit désormais le visible que parce qu'on connaît le langage ; les choses sont offertes à celui qui a pénétré dans le monde des mots ; et si ces mots communiquent à nos sens les choses, c'est qu'ils obéissent à une règle qui est intrinsèque à leur grammaire.

En même temps, l'omniprésence du vocabulaire médical et des parties du corps, dans le texte de Dupré de Lisle, a restreint la distinction au physiologique et à l'anatomique, même si, comme nous le dirons plus loin, l'humain n'est pas absent des préoccupations de l'auteur. Mais il est certainement « allé » davantage sur ses compétences scientifiques, sur les résultats de ses observations et de ses expériences, puisqu'il s'agit de faire évoluer les connaissances sur le cancer.

La description technique est souvent très précise du point de vue de la définition mais elle n'est jamais assortie de chiffres, de mesures, de nombre de cas :

Il ne faut point être surpris si ces sortes de tumeurs malignes sont plus communes dans la matrice & dans les mamelles des femmes, surtout si l'humeur est susceptible de mélasase.

A mesure que la fermentation sourde devient plus forte, la viscosité des souffres acquiert plus d'acidité & d'alkalescence¹², & leur phlogistique excite une forte rougeur & une chaleur assez vive dans les alentours de la tumeur.

(de Lisle, 1774 : 109)

De fait, les descriptions de Dupré de Lisle, conformes à son point de vue de médecin et de clinicien, sont strictement techniques :

Il arrive quelquefois qu'il se forme des vers dans les cancrs ulcérés ; de là plusieurs Auteurs ont imaginé que la tumeur cancéreuse n'étoit produite que par des vers ; ce qui ne peut être que l'effet de la matrice putride.

Ces dénominations servent également à porter une classification des types de cancers en fonction de leur évolution, ce qui est un objectif assigné au Traité sur le Vice cancéreux :

Nous avons assigné trois caractères très-distincts les uns des autres dans les tumeurs dégénétables en cancer. Le premier, par rapport à sa dureté, a été connu sous le nom de Squirre faux ou légitime. Le second prend le nom de cancer ostéole, communément ou invétéré. Le troisième enfin a été appelé cancer ouvert ou ulcéré, & par les Anciens un autre nom.

2.3. Un discours didactique

Le Traité sur le Vice cancéreux, par ses aspects scientifiques, s'adressant à d'autres médecins, se veut également clair et explicite dans sa démarche. Discours de l'épidémiologie, il tend ainsi à une certaine didactique en cherchant à insérer et à diffuser le savoir médical. Pour Sophie Moirand

La didactique se repère au travers de trois types de données, qui permettent de distinguer différentes formes et différentes degrés de didactique (1) de données d'ordre situationnel car il ne peut s'agir que de situations (fût-ce ponctuellement) asymétriques, dans lesquelles l'un des interlocuteurs possède un savoir ou un savoir-faire que l'autre n'a pas, savoir réel ou supposé et, qu'il est en position de faire partager à l'autre ; (2) des données d'ordre fonctionnel car il y a forcément inscriptions dans ce type d'interaction verbale (qu'il s'agisse d'un échange dialogal ou monologal) une intention (réelle simulée ou feinte) de faire savoir, de faire partager ses savoirs, de rendre l'autre plus compétent ou de faire en sorte que l'autre sache... ; (3) des données d'ordre formel sur lesquelles peut appuyer l'analyse linguistique les traces de reformulation inductives ou exductives, procédures de définition, d'explicitation, d'exemplification ; traces sémantiques diverses empruntées à divers codes langagiers et prosodiques, phoniques, kinésiques, proxémiques.

Cette visée didactique est présente très largement dans le Traité du Vicaire révérend. On est dans un discours de transmission de connaissances, d'observations sur « le terrain » d'un savoir-faire. Avec le discours didactique, « on cherche à apporter au récepteur une information qu'il ignore » (Windisch, 1987 : 25). Dupré de Lisle argumente de façon très serrée, explique de façon très pédagogique en direction d'autres spécialistes, de confrères avec qui il partage, échange ses connaissances et qu'il cherche à convaincre. Dans ce sens, Sonia Branta (1999 : 15) montre que « La catégorie de la didacticité permet de ramasser en une des organisations discursives différentes. Placée en surplomb des catégories pratiques elle permet de ne pas s'en tenir à des descriptions monographiques. »

Le discours didactique est analytique, pédagogique et vise à expliquer, à faire comprendre, à transmettre un savoir et un savoir-faire. De fait dans la vie courante, le lecteur d'un texte, s'attend à recevoir un contenu informationnel, une réponse aux questions qu'il se pose ; contenu qu'il va discuter, évaluer. Par exemple, dans cet extrait Dupré de Lisle fait le point sur les connaissances connues sur le chancre, le processus de la maladie, des implications cliniques à l'appui.

L'expérience a consacré plus d'une fois que le chancre pouvait naître dans le grand angle. Il commença par une dureté blanche qui se produisit dans le sac lacrymal. A mesure que la dureté augmenta, la peau qui la couvrait, se divisa & s'ulcère, & elle se manifesta ainsi que la substance chancreuse qui s'étend de plus en plus & se consume peu à peu & elle détrempa les paupières, les sinus obliques, le globe de l'œil, les sinus droits, les os de l'orbite paraissent découvrir ; ils se noircissent & tombent même en pourriture. Alors on remarque de petits foyers des petits filets tendus, blancs, avec des chairs fongueuses. Ce sont ces filets qui forment le chancre.

Cette manière didactique est renforcée par l'emploi d'un vocabulaire mélangé linguistique : « appeler », « être nommé », « être défini comme », « être connu sous le nom », « Jusqu'à présent on a défini », « Tous les médecins l'appellent », « De ce que l'on appelle que l'on appelle », « Une petite tumeur connue sous le nom de squarre ». Le soutien de la définition es^lons^{an} / définition du ^lancer, des ^lypes de ^lumeurs. Sur le plan syntaxique, nous pouvons remarquer la place importante du verbe « être » comme verbe défini^loire qui donne une valeur de ^ler^lude aux énon^lés / « être » es^l l'opérateur de la phrase de base en français (Riegel, 1994 / 252, 285). Sur l'axe d'opposition objet^lif / sujet^lif, D. Kerbrat-Orecchioni (1980 / 72) insiste sur l'abus de langage que représente l'emploi de « être » défini^loire / l'imposition que ^lons^lue le verbe ' être ', qui fait ^lomme si la propriété qu'il a pour fonction d'attribuer à l'objet lui est ^lal^l inséparable^l a^l ^lchée, alors qu'elle ne se ^lons^lue que dans le rapport exist^lan^len^lre l'objet per^lu et le sujet per^lep^lteur.

Le ^lancer n'es^l autre chose qu'une ^lumeur très-irrégulière qui résulte de la conversion des parties squilleuses en une substance h^lideuse, très susceptible d'un singulier accroissement ainsi que d'ulcération ; ^les^l ^l que produisent la ^lation entière des filaments & le mouvement spontané de l'humour en congélation, qui en détruisant la structure des glandes, leur fait prendre une autre forme toute opposée à leur manière d'être.

(Ibidem / 13)

La ^lumeur qu'on appelle ^lampe, & qui se forme à la ^lelle, n'es^l qu'un follicule membraneux, rempli d'une espèce d'humour épaisse.

(Ibidem / 38)

Nous allons faire une simple exposition.

(Ibidem / 38)

La précision de ^les descriptions es^l aussi à mesurer en relation avec les progrès de l'observation qui son^l décisifs. Les premiers microscopes, évoqués plus haut son^l réalisés à la fin du XVII^e avec une lentille braquée sur la source de lumière. ^les instruments simples pe^lme^l déj^là bien de s'écouler (le microscope ordinaire d'aujourd'hui a été réalisé en 1880).

3. L'organisation discursive et énonciative du Traité

Dans ce type de traité, il s'agit d'exposer des réalités de la maladie observées auprès des patients, de manière stricte et pragmatique. Certaines structures syntaxiques très récurrentes semblent obéir à des impératifs didactiques. Le traité est destiné à être lu par des collègues médecins et doit être l'objet d'échanges, de confrontations de points de vue. En langue écrite scientifique, il est soumis à des contraintes codiques, celles de son milieu professionnel et social. Quelques traits sont significatifs de ce didactisme : la place du présent générique, à valeur définitive, l'article défini générique, le pronom « on » d'indétermination énonciative, l'abondance des groupes nominaux. Ainsi ce lexique où dominent les « on » et les groupes nominaux (28 GN pour 18 GV). Le locuteur qui dit « je » est un médecin qui s'adresse à un ensemble de destinataires « ses collègues » qu'il englobe dans le « on » (« qu'on ne l'imagine ») et qu'il prend à témoin de ses hypothèses :

L'incidente de la disposition stœchiométrique dans la masse des humeurs peut par suite de la pression de temps favoriser le vice tant d'eux. Cette indisposition est plus fréquente qu'on ne l'imagine ; elle ne se manifeste pas toujours par des symptômes ordinaires qui puissent frapper les yeux d'un Praticien. Un homme insensé aisé ou les peccates énormes, les confronte souvent pour les faire servir à la découverte de la maladie. Les artères, qui la précèdent ne sont point de grande conséquence, en apparence ; ce sont de légères lassitudes ; on s'aperçoit sans sujet ; d'autrefois on sent une espèce de pesanteur dans toute la machine individuelle, certains mouvements spasmodiques, à la vérité fort éloignés ; la tête, de temps à autre, devient légèrement lourde ; le plus petit mouvement fatigue les malades ; on trouve dans le poul une espèce d'inégalité presque insensible. Je ne parle point des autres artères qui ne se font sentir que, lorsque le vice stœchiométrique a fait des progrès considérables dans la masse commune humorale.

Si nous reprenons les caractéristiques de ce lexique différents traits émergent

3.1.1. Le souci de clarté – La macrostructure

Certains procédés contribuent à ce souci de clarté : d'une part, les marques suprasegmentales (numérotation, italiques, dégroupage en paragraphes, rubriques bien nettes, progression argumentative) manifestent et rappellent aux yeux du lecteur le plan dont les qualités sont un élément important dans l'appréciation d'un exposé ; d'autre part, la ponctuation qui hiérarchise pernicieusement les points, les deux points et les points-virgules, les ligatures et donne un dégroupage de la phrase en propositions subordonnées ne ménagent pas les segments. Elle répond à un souci d'éviter les équivoques, à un impératif de clarté (Grimaresq, 1707 : 44). Le très grand nombre de ligatures (perluètes) à la place de la conjonction de coordination « et », a besoin de segmenter et d'ordonner la pensée :

Il est très-essentiel de sçavoir auparavant la différence qu'il y a entre le squirre et le D'ancer ; & pour connoître parfaitement leur nature, il est très-nécessaire de rechercher avec soin leurs causes & les symptômes qui les distinguent

(de Lisle, 1774 : 9)

De qui caractérise en définitive le texte scientifique médical et didactique, sur le plan formel, est la précision et la sobriété. Il se présente d'abord comme un plan de cours que comme un traité philosophique. L'auteur témoigne d'un souci de dévelop-per une compétence solide dans le domaine abordé et présente des liens clairs et solides entre la science médicale et le phénomène étudié, l'exploitation pertinente des observations. En évitant l'équivoque dans l'expression, les agréments et essoires, le savant nous fait un ethos de l'homme moderne, distrait même dans la polémique ou dans la critique qu'il n'ignore pas lorsqu'il rejette les hypothèses et fausses croyances des autres médecins ou charlatans.

3.1.2. Le rôle du « on »

Le pronom « on » est d'un emploi fréquent dans le texte. La place complexe du pro-nom « on », illusionniste, insaisissable pour F. Amani (1984) qui nous dit : « Les grammairiens l'ont classé, le linguiste l'interprète et « on » se dérobe. »

Dans le Traité de Dupré de Lisle, « on » pronom de l'élasticité référentielle renvoie à l'ensemble de la communauté médicale et lui et les autres médecins, groupe dans lequel il s'intègre. Le pronom est associé à des verbes comme « trouver », « voir », « appeler », « observer », « distinguer », « pouvoir + infinitif » (périphrase verbale).

On voit quelquefois des cancrs qui sont durs et durs durs inégaux, ronds, livides

Lorsqu'on les incise, on y trouve

(Ibidem : 38)

On ne peut point disconvenir que ces enveloppes nerveuses ne puissent se gonfler.

(Ibidem : 41)

D'où on peut inférer, avec quelque fondement, que le Vice d'ancer eux tend à annuellement à changer la structure des parties.

(Ibidem : 88)

De ce fait, le pronom « on » prend bien ici une valeur d'agent vérifiable et comme le dit A. Berendonner (1981 : 45-46) :

Il s'agit pour moi d'un signifié susceptible de renvoyer déictiquement à n'importe quel ensemble d'individus parlants, de manière parfaitement indéterminée. Il s'ensuit que ce On sera souvent compris, volontiers et même renvoyant à une autre instance de parole que celle qui est responsable de l'actualisation de l'énoncé ; mais ce n'est nullement nécessaire. On peut lire, aussi bien que ne pas lire, le locuteur, « ou le desinaire, c'est res affaire de conscience / les jours de l'opinion publique sont toujours moins nets que ceux des individus.

Le « on » occupe dans le texte de Dupré de Lisle une valeur d'appel au consensus sur l'ensemble des connaissances sur le cancer que le « groupe » de spécialistes assume en commun, sans pour autant chercher à s'en extraire.

3.1.3. Les tournures impersonnelles et les présentatifs

L'emploi des impersonnels et des présentatifs est une stratégie d'écriture fréquente dans le texte scientifique qui aspire à l'objectivité. De plus, en décrivant la maladie, on réalise un type de discours dont le sujet d'énonciation est absent. On retrouve donc beaucoup de verbes de type introductif tels que « il y a », « il faut », « il s'agit », « il est impossible », « il n'est pas possible », « il n'est pas difficile de comprendre ». Il y a aussi des verbes personnels qui fonctionnent comme pivots verbaux dans des constructions impersonnelles : « il suffit », « il existe ». Le pronom impersonnel « il » est là dans un fonctionnement syntaxique qui s'adapte bien au caractère didactique comme le souligne P. Le Goffic (1993 : 146-147) :

Le pronom « il » impersonnel (non anaphorique) est sujet en tant que donneur de marques (le verbe se met à la 3^e personne du singulier) ; il manifeste le caractère nécessaire et inévitable de la structure formelle sujet-verbe.

Nous en comprenons l'intérêt qui est de proposer une valeur de vérité ajoutée à l'argumentation. La « sobriété » énonciative est une méthode qui sert la persuasion. Il suggère une transposition de l'assentiment général. La crédibilité du discours est augmentée. L'auteur s'efface derrière la formulation où ce qui importe est ce qui est dit sur l'univers. On a là une clé de l'écriture scientifique, technique qui ne laisse pas trop de place à l'expression subjective. Il y a qui compte est le remplissage lexical de la séquence par le groupe nominal et ses expansions, posé à la construction impersonnelle, comme l'a vu dans ces exemples.

Il est très-essentiel de savoir auparavant la différence qu'il y a entre le squirrel et le canard ; & pour connaître parfaitement leur nature, il est très-nécessaire de rechercher avec soin leurs causes & les symptômes qui les distinguent.

3.1.4. Le présent de l'indicatif

Dans ce texte très didactique où un élève des connaissances sur le cancer est dressé, le présent de l'indicatif est d'un emploi constant dans le Traité sur le Vice cancéreux. C'est le temps lié aux assertions à portée universelle / présent de propriété et d'état présent descriptif ; le temps du discours didactique, du texte défini voire (Riegel, 1994) (Serbaty 1980, 1988). Sur ce point le présent n'a aucune valeur temporelle. Fondé sur des termes génériques comme « les tumeurs », « l'individu », « la lymphé », il sert à exposer un descriptif des mécanismes de la tumeur données comme scientifiquement décrits et répertoriés, à valeur générale et par conséquent incontestables :

Les tumeurs, qui naissent dans quelque partie de l'individu, sont sanguines ou lymphatiques. Les sanguines se produisent communément par fluxion ; elles prennent encore différentes dénominations, par rapport à leur cause ; comme elles importent peu à mon sujet, je les passerai sous silence. Les tumeurs lymphatiques sont étonnées, pour l'ordinaire, par congestion, c'est-à-dire, qu'elles ne se forment que d'une manière presque insensible, par rapport à la longueur & à l'épaississement de la lymphé.

3.1.5. Les nominalisations

Un autre aspect fréquent du texte didactique scientifique est l'emploi du style appelé substantif qui se caractérise par l'abondance des constructions nominales. Le nom est en effet d'un usage très souple. C'est un fait vérifié du discours scientifique (Banks, 2008, 2010 et Ormrod, 2008). Il occupe des positions variables et utiles dans la phrase / il peut être sujet, objet, complément de relation, apposition, complément circonstanciel (avec un jeu de prépositions, de locutions prépositives). Sériol (1986 / 24) a montré l'incidence que représentent les nominalisations pour le lexique polémique :

L'énoncé nominalisé est préconstruit / c'est-à-dire qu'il n'est pas pris en charge par le sujet énonciateur, mais se trouve comme un objet du monde « déjà là », préexistant au discours, qui va servir à insérer une place dans la relation / ses conditions de production ont été effacées.

Il peut s'agir de noms abstraits. L'incidence de la construction nominale est qu'elle permet une qualification précise et riche. Mais les inconvénients de ce style d'écriture sont perceptibles et bien connus puisqu'il ne permet pas comme le verbe d'indiquer le temps et le mode, qu'il n'admet pas toujours la négation (le préfixe négatif n'existe pas toujours et le préfixe « non » n'est pas très élégant comme « non-comparaison »), que certaines consonances sont difficilement rapportées à un nom et que l'abus des noms abstraits, par exemple, conduit à des constructions d'une grande densité qui rebute la pensée et ne facilite pas la compréhension. En outre, le nom abstrait chargé d'exprimer le procès demande un verbe introducteur de sémantisme dépouillé dont l'emploi obligatoire produit de la platitude et de la monotonie : être, faire, il y a, avoir.

Mais ces inconvenients se retrouvent dans le texte didactique et de plus, sont évitables puisque justement on veut donner des vérités à caractère universel dont « hors temps », « au-delà du temps » et que finalement le verbe importe peu. Les noms d'action suppléent au sens.

Le style substantif convient donc bien à la langue scientifique, même contemporaine, parce que les noms se prêtent mieux que les verbes et que les adjectifs aux définitions abstraites. Ils peuvent ainsi recevoir de leurs mots associés des déterminations précises. Ils s'entendent avec une grande rigueur logique dans des phrases reflétant sous une forme ramassée une pensée complexe ; le défaut stylistique est bien sûr l'abus de la préposition « de » et des noms en « ion ». Les scientifiques utilisent beaucoup du style substantif : phrase sans verbe (débarrassée des impedimenta de la chaîne propositionnelle), emploi des noms pour exprimer les actions, ou les qualités et ainsi aboutir à un ratio ut esse menant à des constructions.

On relève ainsi, dans le texte de Dupré de Lisle, un grand nombre de noms d'action, en -ion comme « ulcération », « filtration », « conversion ». Ces noms permettent un inventaire plus commode des effets où les actions sont rangées sur le même plan que les états (noms en -ie, -ose). Les groupes nominaux fonctionnent également apparemment un lexique de mots techniques. Au plan morphologique, ces substantifs sont construits fréquemment sur des radicaux et des affixes grecs-latins pour désigner aussi bien les noms de maladie que les parties du corps. De plus, les termes lexicaux sont fidèles à la tradition antique et se lient dans les dictionnaires modernes pour distinguer les langues scientifiques. Par ailleurs, cela se justifie par le fait que les termes simples ou les substantifs organiques dictionnaires et analysés par la science ont une existence naturelle stable que l'étymologie latine et grecque garantissent en quelque sorte.

La technique du vocabulaire consisterait aussi parfois en un sens particulier donné à un mot pour ainsi dire le mot « dépravation », très communément employé dans le traité. Le mot est issu du latin classique depravatio de sens propre et figuré mais qui n'a plus qu'une valeur morale aujourd'hui de corruption, avilissement, perversion. Dans le traité de Dupré de Lisle le mot « dépravation » renvoie à « ordre, contourner, rendre difforme » pour parler des parties du corps ou à « gâter, corrompre » pour l'idée de purification inhérente à la tumeur cancéreuse, de pourriture.

3.2. La Posture énonciative de l'auteur et le Discours moral

Au-delà de ces caractéristiques techniques et didactiques, une particularité du texte scientifique du XVIII^e est qu'il se démarque du discours des XX^e-XXI^e siècles en mêlant aux développements scientifiques des considérations morales ; ce qui se lie dans les conceptions de Dupré de Lisle sur la Santé. Il associe le souhait de progresser dans la connaissance du cancer et de ses causes avec la préoccupation d'être toujours utile à l'homme. En tel a il es très proche du discours d'Ambroise Paré (Lozachmeur, 2013) dans son Livre de médecine :

L'homme naît avec la faculté de sentir & de juger ; mais cette faculté a besoin d'être dirigée par l'étude & par les préceptes. La nature lui a fait, en quelque manière, ses secrets ; du moins elle a voulu réveiller son industrie, aiguïser son courage & ses forces. Il ne peut rien découvrir que par un travail opiniâtre, & par des expériences répétées.

3.2.1. L'abondance des termes subjectifs

Les traits de ce discours se marquent dans l'emploi d'adjectifs évaluatifs, mélioratifs ou péjoratifs associés à des degrés de comparaison (très, trop...), des mots du lexique qui désignent omment une chose peut être bonne ou mauvaise (Kerbrat-Orecchioni, 1980). Il est ainsi question de « redoutable fléau », de « maladie des plus redoutables », de « passions violentes », des « horreurs de cette terrible maladie », de « fœdité insupportable », de « substance hideuse » pour qualifier le cancer, expressions dont l'intention est moralisante. Il s'inscrit là, dans les traditions du genre épideutique : « on donne à connaître les bonnes ou mauvaises qualités du sujet que l'on traite, pour le louer ou le blâmer. »¹³ Arisote fixe le cadre de ce discours où « la période principale est le présent, car c'est généralement sur des faits actuels que l'on prononce l'éloge ou le blâme ; mais on a souvent à rappeler le passé, ou à conjecturer l'avenir. » (1991) Nous retrouvons ces éléments dans le Traité où nous avons un discours souvent binaire qui fait la distinction entre ce qui est acceptable moralement et ce qui ne l'est pas. C'est la qualification des faits qui est primordiale sur la base de valeurs morales de pitié, de compassion et d'un vocabulaire axiologique.

Tout le discours de Dupré de Lisle témoigne du souhait de lutter contre la maladie et de prévenir en recherchant les causes qui sont au manque de moyens de combattre le mal. De fait, le vocabulaire de l'ordre moral, du bien, du mal, est très prégnant. Par exemple, l'auteur dénonce les comportements susceptibles de déclencher le cancer.

Et ce qui est remarquable dans ce lexique très technique est évidemment l'abondance des termes subjectifs que Kerbrat-Orecchioni (1980) a classifiés : les adjectifs subjectifs (« heureux », « vase », « sage »), les noms subjectifs, (« folie », « dupe », « soulagement »), les verbes et adverbes subjectifs (modalité négative, « prescrire », « malheureusement », « désirons »).

Les sciences sont un champ immense, & malheureusement pour nous nos esprits sont bornés : de là vient que, ne pouvant parvenir qu'un peu loin d'un vase terrein, & ayant la folie de le vouloir mesurer au cer, nous devenons la dupe de notre amour-propre. Heureux l'homme qui est assez sage pour se tenir dans les bornes que lui prescrivent son génie, ses deux & sa condition.

Trop heureux si nous pouvons faire quelque découverte utile, & plus heureux encore si ces découvertes nous tribuent au bonheur que nous le désirons, au soulagement de nos semblables.

(Ibidem 7 ix)

L'auteur évoque ainsi une « maladie des plus redoutables qui puisse le plus intéresser l'humanité. » (Ibidem 7 xiv)

3.2.2. L'homme de sciences

Dupré de Lisle, en tant que médecin, témoigne de son projet scientifique, tout en exprimant ses positions personnelles subjectives 7 il souhaite « remédier », apporter des solutions.

Je me rappelle avoir été consulté, il y a quelques années, pour une femme qui avait depuis douze ans, une tumeur à la mamelle gauche 7 jusques-là elle ne lui avait pas causé le plus petit inconvénient 7 elle s'était toujours bien trouvée des avis que lui donnait son chirurgien ; mais épouvantée & fort sollicitée par des personnes enthousiasmées des remèdes empiriques, elle alla consulter un docteur qui lui dit qu'on disait guérir de toutes les maladies. 7 l'homme lui fit prendre beaucoup de remèdes, & lui appliqua des topiques sur la petite tumeur squirreuse. Le Squirrel, fatigué par ces remèdes impudiquement appliqués, dégénéra en cancer, & cette ionna sous les atteintes de cette maladie qui accompagnent communément le cancer manifeste, & qui se terminent qu'à la mort.

Il ne propose pas d'évaluations chiffrées qui seraient plus scientifiques et se contentent d'une évaluation hyperbolique certes, mais vague 7 comment mesurer la portée des mots « considérable », « fatigant », « fatigant », « impudiquement appliqué », « insupportable », « incurable » « véhément » « baveuses » ? Le texte parle par lui-même. L'auteur trouve des attentions sincères pour déplorer les ravages de la maladie. 7 c'est la voix de la morale 7

Je m'efforcerai de démontrer la fausseté de toutes ces opinions 7 elles ne sont fondées que sur des conjectures apparentes qu'on regarde comme des principes certains, quand on ne sent point l'absence immense qu'il y a souvent entre le Vrai & le Vraisemblable.

7 c'est de la description du cancer se fait avec des qualificatifs qui supposent une évaluation en termes axiologiques bons/mauvais. Parfois même dans l'exemple qui suit les descriptions de Dupré de Lisle sont très proches des analyses contemporaines 7 le rôle du stress dans la maladie ou de l'abus de l'alcool. Il explique la maladie avec des termes techniques mais en même temps il y mêle des considérations morales sur l'évaluation des effets ressentis, les comportements contraires à la norme 7 abus, trop grand usage du vin¹⁴.

Les personnes sensibles, qui s'affectent de suite, ou qui restent long-temps affectés de ce qui leur arrive, qui se livrent à des passions violentes, ou à trop grand usage du vin ou des liqueurs spiritueuses, à des exercices ouverts qui éprouvent des effets d'un froid subit ou des chaleurs excessives, s'exposent à la longue à des maladies chroniques.
(Ibidem / 75)

Ainsi, outre le souci didactique dominant, Dupré de Lisle se met en scène en tant que locuteur spécialisé en employant « on » pour décrire ses méthodes de soigner les patients, consacrées par la souffrance, les ravages de la maladie et cela, sans donner les limites théoriques de la tumeur, par exemple. Toutefois, à l'appréciation de l'interlocuteur qui doit construire un référent derrière ses descriptions. Les modalités appréciatives sont très fortes et expriment des positions discursives variées. Il use de grandes nuances dans le ton qui va jusqu'à l'indignation quand il dénonce les pratiques de certains charlatans.

Et, l'ethos, image de sa propre personne que l'auteur construit pour renforcer sa crédibilité, entre en jeu avec la mise en scène du « je », élément important du discours épideictique / pour être crédible, il doit établir un mouvement de sympathie vers l'auditoire, engager sa légitimité, présenter sa parole comme authentique et sérieuse, montrer combien il s'implique. Amossy (2014 / 21) rappelle le fonctionnement de l'ethos /

Il n'est seulement quand on prend en compte l'acte de s'approprier la langue pour communiquer avec l'autre, à savoir le plan de l'énonciation, qu'on peut penser la construction discursive d'une image du « je » à l'incarnation d'un « tu » ou d'un « vous ». L'exercice s'efforce au gré d'un jeu spéculatif qu'a bien mis en évidence Michel Pécheux (1969), et que lui emprunte la linguistique de l'énonciation et de qu'il a élaborée par Catherine Kerbrat-Orecchioni (1980) / l'émulateur (ou locuteur) A se fait une image de lui-même et de son interlocuteur B ; réciproquement B se fait une image de A et de lui-même. Il est dans ce cas interdépendant que se met en place l'ethos comme image de soi construite dans le discours.

Dans cet exemple, Dupré de Lisle se construit une image de scientifique mesuré, sérieux, confrontant les points de vue à l'incarnation de ses confrères médecins qui en attendent un discours conforme à leur code professionnel /

J'ai déjà rapporté comment on avait défini le cancer / cette définition ne paraît point des plus exactes, ainsi qu'il est aisé de le démontrer par les expériences anatomiques & par la seule structure de la tumeur caractérisée, comme l'a très-bien remarqué le Docteur Deshaies Gendron.

3.2.3. Le discours moral

Les termes moraux se mêlent donc consciemment au vocabulaire scientifique et didactique. On peut remarquer que des mots du lexique moral sont transposés dans la langue médicale, comme « malignité » ou « dépravation » traités plus haut. Dès l'ouverture du traité, dans son épître au Comte de Provence, il insiste sur les Contre-pas moraux de vertu et d'honneur qui président à son entreprise : « les Princes qui ont le plus honoré l'humanité par leurs vertus, ont toujours regardé les Sciences comme le plus ferme appui des trônes, et le garant le plus sûr de la fidélité des peuples ».

Dupré de Lisle valorise « les Sciences, appui des trônes », ainsi que l'amour du Travail, l'utile qui peut « étendre les idées, élever l'âme, donner de l'éclat aux actions. » En médecine au service des hommes, comme il se présente, il qualifie donc le « vice cancéreux » de « maladie des plus redoutables » avec la force du superlatif. Son objectif est explicite lorsqu'il le présente au Comte de Provence : « Puisse ce foible essai être aussi utile à l'humanité que vous êtes cher par l'assemblage des vertus les plus héroïques. »

Il est pour répondre à cet objectif moral qu'il se présente comme un homme de science soucieux d'exercer sa profession dans la rigueur et la vérité :

Quiconque veut s'assurer de la vérité, doit non seulement observer la marche de la nature, mais encore analyser ses effets, les confronter souvent les uns les autres. C'est le seul moyen de tirer des conséquences justes des principes, & de former un plan de doctrine sûr & invariable. C'est aussi par-là qu'un Médecin éclairé, observateur réfléchi, pourra juger de la différence des maladies & des symptômes qui les caractérisent.

Conclusion

Ce qui ressort de la lecture analytique du Traité de Dupré de Lisle dans un premier temps, est la structure syntaxique énonciative du discours avec ses deux pôles : l'abondance des marques subjectives d'une part et d'autre part les marques du discours scientifique que sont les constructions impersonnelles, présentes, le présent générique, les articles définis génériques, l'emploi des nominalisations. Ces observations ouvrent la construction d'un modèle du traité médical et au-delà d'un genre discursif du texte scientifique, bien défini par des règles d'énonciation.

Ainsi dans le « discours préliminaire » de l'auteur qui donne le ton à l'ouvrage : « La nature a confié à l'homme ses secrets. L'homme ne peut rien découvrir que par un travail opiniâtre et par ses expériences répétées. »

Nous avons pu remarquer qu'ouïe la posture didactique et technique qui sied à l'homme de science et qui accumule les détails informatifs sur les faits, l'affectivité et la subjectivité ne sont pas absentes. En effet les considérations morales ne sont pas ignorées et derrière le discours médical précis qui rend compte de l'expérience se devine le cursus d'un homme du XVIII^e réceptif à l'harmonie de la langue et à la recherche d'effets stylistiques. En témoigne l'abondance des figures dans les descriptions. Cette approche de la maladie associe les aspects humains et médicaux préfigure les tendances d'une médecine cancérologique contemporaine soucieuse de la qualité de vie des patients (Colomba, 2015 ; Scieur, Lozachmeur, 2015).

ABSTRACT: Teaching Technical French for future engineers: Issues and Implementation

In the preparation of our lecture of Technical French for engineers, we strongly need resources in the area that interest the students. Therefore, we choose the most demanded areas by the majority of students: electrical engineering, energy, aerospace, computer science applied in engineering, the engineering of environmental protection in the industry. For the selection of proposed texts we have at our disposal many technical manuals, scientific articles, sites and specialized press in the area concerned. But our role is not only to develop an attractive and interesting course, we must also help students overcome feelings of linguistic insecurity that manifest itself in most cases in early learning (students wonder if they can make the course to the end). Our mission is to encourage students showing them the benefits they may have at the end of this training (grades in French, a better job, promotion prospects). In classroom communication must be made in French and not in Romanian. Although at first the students have difficulty communicating in French and we must help them to formulate their sentences later, after many years, they will make clear progress. Finally, we must not forget that to communicate in a foreign language, we need to understand the culture of that language. The intercultural aspect will certainly be present among the activities we offer students.

1. Introduction

Le cursus pour l'obtention du diplôme d'ingénieur en ingénierie électrique requiert quatre années d'études, la première année étant commune et les trois dernières étant consacrées à la spécialisation. Quant au module de français, il figure lors des deux premières années, avec deux heures par semaine. Il est désigné dans l'emploi du temps sous l'appellation « Langue étrangère », les étudiants ayant le choix entre le français et l'anglais. Dans l'élaboration de notre cours de français technique pour les ingénieurs, nous avons vivement besoin de ressources dans le domaine qui intéresse les étudiants. C'est pourquoi, nous choisissons les domaines les plus demandés par la majorité des étudiants ingénierie électrique, énergétique, aérospatiale, informatique appliquée dans l'ingénierie, l'ingénierie de la protection de l'environnement dans l'industrie. Pour le choix des textes proposés nous avons à notre disposition de nombreux manuels techniques, des articles scientifiques, des sites et la presse spécialisée dans le domaine concerné.

2. La langue spécialisée

Il est caractéristique le plus une langue spécialisée, c'est d'abord son utilisation dans une situation ou un contexte professionnel, c'est-à-dire entre deux spécialistes d'un domaine particulier. Par exemple dans un atelier de mécanique où deux ingénieurs mécaniciens discutent de la reprogrammation de la cartographie moteur.

D'après le modèle saussurien, la langue se subdivise en trois sous-systèmes donc chacun a ses spécificités et ses usages. Le premier sous-système est la langue usuelle, c'est-à-dire la langue générale, courante, commune, que chacun peut comprendre. Le deuxième sous-système fait référence à la langue poétique ou littéraire. Enfin, le troisième et dernier sous-système est la langue spécialisée.

Si les étudiants ont du mal à comprendre et à s'exprimer en français général, nous pensons qu'il sera aussi fort probable qu'ils n'arriveront pas à comprendre, ni à produire une langue spécialisée qui dans bien des cas est plus difficile que la langue générale. La langue spécialisée, implique différentes ressources propres à la langue usuelle, comme les articles, les déterminants, les adverbess et les verbes (un lexique usuel compris par les non-initiés). En effet, dans la pratique de la langue spécialisée, le noyau dur de la langue générale est conservé, ce sont les dénominations et les termes qui changent suivant les domaines et les champs de l'activité humaine.

Il n'est que le vocabulaire qui fait que l'usage de la langue soit particulier à un domaine puisque les règles syntaxiques et morphologiques, employées par un spécialiste sont issues de la langue générale. En d'autres termes, un astrophysicien pour communiquer une information spécialisée utilisera la même syntaxe qu'un individu parlant d'un fait divers, la différence réside uniquement dans le lexique qui est spécifique au domaine de l'astrophysique.

La langue spécialisée ne se limite pas simplement au vocabulaire, bien au contraire, elle s'étend à la phrase et même au texte, elle englobe les usages diversifiés et sur tous des aspects morphosyntaxiques, ainsi qu'une grammaire lexicale propre aux textes spécialisés. L'usage de la langue dans un domaine précis sera donc marqué par des tournures syntaxiques récurrentes, par des structures lexicales marquant et contribuant fortement en plus des termes spécialisés à sa démarcation et à son uniformité.

3. Le français scientifique et le français technique

Les dénominations français scientifique et français technique ne sont pas dénuées de sens puisque chacune est porteuse de significations. Pour permettre une distinction entre le scientifique et le technique, ou plus encore, entre le technique et le technologique, on pourra se référer à la vision de Guilbert pour qui la langue scientifique est employée par des locuteurs homogènes dans une sphère distincte et dont la principale forme d'expression est l'écrit. Le français scientifique est beaucoup plus employé par des hommes de sciences caractérisés par une formation et une démarche académiques et qui produisent souvent des textes scientifiques comme des articles, des actes de colloque ou des thèses. On trouve au français technique qui est plus utilisé dans des sphères beaucoup plus pratiques, par des locuteurs hétérogènes n'ayant pas le degré de spécialisation des scientifiques et produisant un langage beaucoup plus axé sur l'oral et sur les aspects pratiques et fonctionnels.

En plus des signes linguistiques que l'on retrouve dans toute langue, le technoléc se caractérise aussi par des signes extralinguistiques. L'inclé des unités brachygraphiques est l'économie et la réduction du discours pour communiquer l'information le plus rapidement et le plus efficacement possible. Ainsi dans les unités brachygraphiques nous pouvons distinguer ce qu'a appelé Kozourek les unités brachygraphiques idéologiques, qui sont constituées à la fois de symboles spéciaux et des chiffres (unités numériques), comme les symboles mathématiques, les lettres grecques, les formules chimiques (lettre + chiffre).

Le technoléc n'est pas une langue à part, parce que les spécialistes d'un domaine spécifique utilisent les mêmes règles syntaxiques qu'un individu parlant de faits divers par exemple. Toutefois, il existe quelques structures syntaxiques récurrentes que l'on retrouve beaucoup plus qu'ailleurs. Des tournures syntaxiques fréquemment employées dans le discours des scientifiques servent plus à étonner le discours, les énoncés et à communiquer l'information objectivement et de manière rigoureuse.

Il est peu fréquent de retrouver dans la communication scientifique les deuxièmes personnes du pluriel et du singulier tu et vous. La plupart des phrases des textes scientifiques sont construites à l'aide du on du il, du nous, et parfois aussi du je. Globalement l'utilisation du je se limite à des situations de communication informelles ou qui s'éloignent des propos scientifiques.

Le locuteur parlant d'un domaine spécifique, utilisera le nous pour deux raisons. Premièrement pour garder un certain recul et une distance vis-à-vis de ses propos (le nous de modestie), mais aussi pour insérer le destinataire dans l'action qu'il va mener. La même chose est valable pour le pronom on qui est utilisé beaucoup comme le nous dans un but de modestie et pour introduire le destinataire (on de modestie et on inclusif) Des deux pronoms personnels sont souvent associés aux verbes d'auteur, comme aborder, admettre, ajouter, s'apercevoir, chercher à, conclure, constater, définir, déterminer, dire, estimer, induire, montrer, noter, présenter, remarquer, supposer, traiter, trouver, vérifier, voir. La seule différence entre le nous et le on réside dans le sens, puisque on est beaucoup moins personnel alors que le nous ne s'emploie que comme sujet.

L'usage du pronom impersonnel il dans les textes technoscientifiques, n'est pas très différent de celui de la langue courante, parfois les expressions qui le suivent généralement sont spécifiques au technoléc : il est clair que, il est évident que, il convient de, il est impossible, il est indispensable, il est nécessaire. À l'exception des pronoms déictiques on, nous et il, les textes scientifiques ne comportent que des pronoms anaphoriques qui généralement sont des pronoms des troisièmes personnes du singulier et du pluriel il(s), elle(s), le, la, lui, eux, les, leur. Des mêmes pronoms servent aussi à établir des liens entre les propositions des phrases. Nous pouvons donc constater que l'utilisation massive des pronoms nous, on et il, montre à quel point le style syntaxique du technoléc s'appuie sur la forme impersonnelle, et ce, dans un but de neutralité et de rigueur dans le discours.

On trouve dans les textes scientifiques la présence de plusieurs temps verbaux, comme le conditionnel servant à exprimer une hypothèse, le futur simple présent dans les introductions, le passé composé que l'on retrouve généralement dans les conclusions, ou encore l'impératif qui sert à formuler une injonction, ou à introduire éventuellement des analephes dans son discours, sur ou avant des verbes comme notons, remarquons, (comme c'est le cas aussi pour les pronoms indéfinis nous et on).

Toutefois, le présent de l'indicatif reste le temps verbal le plus utilisé dans les discours scientifiques. Koutourek annonce que 85% des verbes dans les corpus de textes scientifiques qu'il a étudiés sont conjugués au présent de l'indicatif, alors que 10% sont réservés au passé composé et au futur et le reste est réparti entre différents temps et modes. De plus, les verbes conjugués au présent de l'indicatif dans le discours ethnoscience acquièrent un point de vue aspectuel plus que temporel selon Phal, c'est-à-dire que les verbes prennent une valeur permanente et générale. On trouve aussi dans les textes scientifiques, la présence de quelques phrases interrogatives servant parfois à introduire une explication possible suggérée ainsi que quelques propositions infinitives injonctives comme dans les notes et les manuels d'utilisation. Cependant, ces sont les phrases déclaratives qui sont prédominantes dans le discours des sciences, elles contribuent largement à la fonction référentielle et à l'objectivité, ou comme le passif qui met en relief les choses étudiées ainsi que le résultat obtenu et masque encore plus l'auteur, c'est pour cela d'ailleurs qu'il est souvent lié à l'impersonnalité.

Le style des textes scientifiques se caractérise aussi par une complexité au niveau de la syntaxe. La plupart des phrases relevant du ethnolexe sont très chargées, elles sont majoritairement complexes et temporellement plus de deux subordonnées et plus de 25 mots, c'est la raison pour laquelle on retrouve beaucoup de conjonctions, de déterminants et de pronoms relatifs.

Ainsi, plus l'information est complète et plus la phrase sera longue et complexe, cela donne ce qu'a appelé Koutourek la condensation syntaxique qui regroupe le maximum d'informations et concentre les énoncés en une seule phrase complexe. Pour que la condensation syntaxique puisse se réaliser, les locuteurs d'un domaine spécifique, notamment des sciences dures, emploient quelques procédés syntaxiques et lexicaux tels que la transformation lexicale qui consiste à remplacer une phrase par un seul mot équivalant on appelle généralement ces procédés nominalisation, adjectivation et pronominalisation. Les procédés de formation lexicale, comme la dérivation et la composition ainsi que l'affixation sont utilisés très fréquemment. La réduction des phrases par l'ellipse et par l'utilisation de propositions infinitives, ainsi que la voix passive se retrouvent dans le ethnolexe.

Le ethnolexe englobe trois catégories de classes lexicales, le lexique usuel et courant de la langue générale, le lexique général des sciences qui fait référence à des termes souvent employés dans des domaines scientifiques (verbes, adjectifs et substantifs) et finalement le lexique spécialisé, propre à un domaine précis. Tout comme la langue générale, les classes lexicales ethnolexicales sont toutes aussi variées, on retrouve ainsi la classe nominale qui est de loin la catégorie lexicale la plus prisée dans le discours des sciences, elle regroupe des substantifs et des syntagmes nominaux. La Classe lexicale adjectivale qui regroupe en plus de l'adjectif, des adjectifs verbaux, et que pièce travaillante et des participes adjectivés comme ces pièces détachées. La classe lexicale verbale est aussi très présente dans le discours technique, on peut même affirmer qu'elle se positionne dans le deuxième rang après la classe lexicale nominale. Elle regroupe les verbes et les syntagmes verbaux qu'ils soient au mode personnel ou impersonnel (participe, gérondif, infinitif). La classe lexicale adverbiale comporte des adverbes et des locutions adverbiales, quelquefois quelques adverbes peuvent aussi jouer le rôle de coordonnants comme donc, par conséquent.

Les déterminants sont aussi présents comme dans toute langue générale et servent à la construction de discours. Les coordonnants servent à organiser les textes et à établir une cohérence englobant les conjonctions de coordination, les locutions conjonctives et les conjonctions et locutions de subordination. Enfin, la classe lexicale prépositive comporte des prépositions et des locutions prépositives, comme les prépositions et les locutions pré-infinitives qui sont les plus fréquentes et qui précèdent généralement l'infinitif, exemple pour, avant de.

En dépit de cette classification lexicale, qui est pratiquement identique à celle de la langue générale, il existe une deuxième catégorisation que nous pouvons appliquer au lexique technique. Cette catégorisation s'applique à deux classes de termes selon leurs fonctions dans le discours. Nous appelons classe lexicale faible, les termes qui servent à préciser davantage et à mieux expliciter l'information, ils aident l'informateur à construire son énoncé, c'est le cas des prépositions, des coordonnants, des déterminants, des adverbes et de quelques adjectifs et de verbes, comme les verbes d'auteur, les auxiliaires ou les semi-auxiliaires par exemple. La catégorie lexicale faible est globalement issue de la langue générale, puisque pratiquement tous les déterminants, conjonctions et locutions adverbiales sont inaliénables et employés par les profanes. La deuxième catégorie, qu'on appelle classe lexicale forte, comporte les substantifs ou les syntagmes nominaux, les classes lexicales verbales, adjectivales et quelques adverbes ou des locutions adverbiales. Cette catégorie lexicale, contrairement à la classe lexicale faible ne joue pas simplement le rôle de « mots outils », mais en globe plus de termes spécifiques aux domaines, ou aux sciences dures et dont la majorité n'est pas comprise par les non-initiés.

Si le lexique usuel fait partie de la classe lexicale faible et que le lexique spécifique à un domaine s'intègre dans la classe lexicale forte, où se situe alors le lexique général des sciences ? Ou ce qu'on appelle aussi le vocabulaire général à orientation scientifique. Nous pouvons affirmer que le VGOS est à la fois dans les classes lexicales faibles et fortes, puisqu'il emprunte le lexique usuel, mais aussi quelques termes (substantifs, verbes, adjectifs) qui restent opaques et ambigus pour le profane, ces termes sont communs à plusieurs domaines et on les retrouve dans différentes sciences.

On a besoin d'un référentiel précis et détaillé des différentes situations de communication, des structures phrasiques et desournures syntaxiques récurrentes ainsi que du lexique fréquemment employé, dans le but d'extraire un corpus et de le modéliser pour en faire un discours spécifique répondant aux besoins et aux attentes des apprenants. Cette finesse dans la mise en place des objectifs représente l'une des caractéristiques principales de l'enseignement du FOS, accompagnée de la limite du temps.

4. L'enseignement du français technique

Se contenter d'enseigner la langue uniquement (à partir du lexique, de la syntaxe, de la grammaire et de la phonétique) demeure pratiquement insuffisant pour atteindre les objectifs fixés. La culture joue assurément un rôle très important dans l'enseignement/l'apprentissage des langues, elle permet de mettre en évidence quelques aspects langagiers complexes qui régissent l'interaction/compréhension, voire la communication.

Jean Jacques Richer, distingue trois éléments culturels indissociables à un enseignement du FOS : les données socio-économiques, qui permettent de donner une vue d'ensemble ou une synthèse sur le contexte économique français ; les données anthropologiques qui englobent des conceptions du temps, de l'espace, de la hiérarchie, de l'autorité, de l'environnement de la conversation, de l'implicité et de l'explicité puisque elles jouent un rôle important pour la communication au sein des entreprises et régissent l'interaction/compréhension dans un milieu professionnel ; les cultures d'entreprises qui montrent le fonctionnement interne des entreprises françaises et qui donnent un aperçu des relations d'égalité, de hiérarchie et de prise en compte de l'individu.

Dependant la question que nous devrions nous poser serait : est-ce que ces aspects culturels devraient être enseignés avec le même degré d'importance que les traits linguistiques dont auraient besoin les apprenants ? Nous pensons en réalité que les contenus culturels dans les programmes de FOS pourraient être relégués au deuxième rang, car dans un contexte d'apprentissage où le temps est très limité et où les apprenants ont plus besoin de lexique, de règles de grammaire pour pouvoir comprendre et s'exprimer, les composantes linguistiques devraient prendre le pas sur les aspects culturels, du moins lors des premières séances.

L'enseignant a vu son rôle profondément changer, surtout depuis l'avènement de l'approche communicative, où il ne se considère plus comme un simple transmetteur de savoirs qui arrive en classe, dit le son cours et corrige les exercices, puis s'en va. L'enseignant dans l'approche actionnelle est devenu un médiateur, un facilitateur, qui oriente l'apprenant et lui montre la route à suivre. Bien entendu le but de l'enseignant est de faire parvenir aux apprenants ce dont ils ont besoin ou ce qu'ils sont venus chercher, de mettre à leur disposition les outils nécessaires à la tâche, il doit expliquer parfois ce que les apprenants n'ont pas compris. Mais le vrai rôle de l'enseignant réside dans le fait de pouvoir rendre l'apprenant autonome et capable de suivre lui-même son apprentissage et de pouvoir s'autoévaluer.

Les besoins langagiers regroupent trois composantes essentielles : la composante linguistique, la composante psychosociale, et la composante socioculturelle. Lorsqu'un individu désire apprendre une langue étrangère, il ressent généralement au début des cours un sentiment d'insécurité qui le fait douter sur sa capacité à pouvoir poursuivre l'apprentissage de cette langue. L'apprenant est obligé de surmonter cette forme d'insécurité linguistique, parce qu'il est parfois contraint de suivre l'apprentissage. Toutefois, il arrive que les apprenants n'arrivent pas à surmonter ce sentiment d'insécurité linguistique et finissent par abandonner les cours de FOS. Il existe des solutions pour remédier à ce problème, surtout lors des premières séances.

L'enseignant pourra, au dŕbut de l'apprentissage, affirmer aux apprenants leur capacitŕ de dŕpasser de dŕbutants ŕ turisants. Pour ce faire, nous recommandons de commenter l'enseignement par des contenus qui devraient ŕtre ŕ la fois simples et accessibles pour tous les apprenants, respecter la graduation de l'enseignement ŕviter de poser des questions difficiles au dŕbut de l'enseignement ŕtablir des relations directes avec les apprenants dans et hors la classe pour connaŕtre de prŕs leurs difficultŕs d'apprentissage, susciter l'investissement et la motivation des apprenants, tenir compte, notamment en classe de FOS qui est souvent hŕtrogŕne, du facteur de l'âge des apprenants de leurs savoirs et aussi de leurs professions.

La composante linguistique comporte trois points principaux, tout d'abord la communication en classe qui doit se faire gŕnŕalement en langue étrangŕre mŕme si les apprenants n'arrivent pas ŕ comprendre. Il est vrai que lors des premiŕres sŕances, les apprenants ont quelques difficultŕs ŕ pouvoir comprendre les consignes ŕmises par l'enseignant il est important ŕ ce moment-lŕ de familiariser les apprenants ŕ ŕvoluer en classe en langue étrangŕre, en s'adressant aux apprenants avec une langue simple et des consignes claires et faciles ŕ retenir.

Le deuxiŕme point important de la composante langagière est l'ŕcart entre la communication apprise en classe et celle de la vie rŕelle. En effet dans beaucoup de situations l'apprenant se sent dŕsorientŕ avec les diffŕents supports, car souvent ils ne sont pas adaptŕs aux situations de communications rŕelles auxquelles l'apprenant doit faire face. Les apprenants montrent un plus grand enthousiasme lorsqu'il s'agit d'ŕtudier des situations de communication qui s'apparentent avec l'contexte rŕel dans lequel ils ŕvoluent et c'est pour cette raison que l'on prŕfŕe d'opŕer pour le choix des documents authentiques et mŕme s'ils ne sont pas parfaitement idŕntiques ŕ la communication rŕelle, ils contribuent ŕ mieux affronter les situations de la vie quotidienne que cela soit dans le domaine universitaire ou professionnel.

La composante socio-culturelle joue un rŕle ŕ part dans l'enseignement du franŕais technique. Comme nous l'avons signalŕ quelques lignes plus haut la culture a une place plus qu'importante dans l'enseignement du FOS, car sans un arriŕre-plan culturel beaucoup de malentendus peuvent intervenir et l'apprenant ne pourra pas interagir efficacement avec des interlocuteurs ŕtrangers. De plus, la dimension socio-culturelle dans l'enseignement du FOS permet aussi de rendre la mise en pratique du programme beaucoup plus authentique et contribue ŕ son rapprochement avec les situations de la vie rŕelle. L'aspect socio-culturel constitue certes, un besoin considŕrable, mais il ne faudra pas le prŕfŕer aux autres besoins langagiers qui demeurent selon nous, les plus urgents surtout lorsque le temps ne joue pas en la faveur de la formation.

En dŕveloppant les formes de travail participatives, c'est-ŕ-dire en favorisant et en encourageant la pratique langagière dans le cours de langue, en donnant la prioritŕ ŕ l'apprenant en le mettant au centre de l'apprentissage et en minimisant les interventions de l'enseignant en combinant le travail collectif avec des moments de travail individuel, on pourra permettre ŕ la fois ŕ l'apprenant d'ŕthanger et de pratiquer la langue avec ses camarades, tout en l'aidant ŕ pouvoir se dŕbrouiller seul et ŕ acquŕrir son autonomie.

La motivation des étudiants dépend donc forcément de la nature et des contenus des cours de langue qui leur sont proposés, de l'approche didactique et des outils linguistiques mis à leur disposition, et finalement le fait que les étudiants ont besoin de réformation et d'encouragement. Beaucoup n'assistent pas aux cours à cause de la frustration qu'ils ont accumulée pendant les années du collège et du lycée, où l'enseignement du français n'est pas des plus plaisants. Les étudiants n'ont pas suffisamment confiance en eux et ont toujours peur que l'enseignant leur demande de prendre la parole en public ou de répondre à une question, ils souffrent d'un sentiment insécurisé linguistique. L'enseignant de langue dans ce genre de situation doit être une source d'encouragements pour les étudiants ; un accompagnateur qui guide, supervise et motive les étudiants.

5. Conclusions

Les objectifs présentés ci-dessus sont en général combinés pendant les leçons en fonction du niveau de compétence initiale ou acquise pendant plusieurs leçons par les étudiants en fonction de leurs besoins immédiats : la préparation d'un ouvrage scientifique, la participation à un thème de recherche par exemple, l'élaboration du projet de diplôme, la participation à une conférence programmée ou à une réunion internationale, échange d'étudiants. Des situations éventuelles peuvent conduire aussi à un travail différentiel par groupes d'étudiants.

En élaborant ses matériels didactiques le professeur doit tenir compte des besoins des étudiants, en introduisant des matériels optionnels, différenciés selon les niveaux, les aptitudes et les demandes des étudiants. L'objectif primordial est que les étudiants soient capables de consulter sans difficultés des matériels documentaires en français technique, de comprendre une communication orale spécialisée et de s'exprimer à un niveau minimal ou moyen compréhensible, utilisant activement la terminologie de spécialité.

After signing the Bologna Declaration in 2010, Kazakhstan became the 47th member country of the Bologna process and the first central Asian stakeholder in the European educational space. In this context, the Ministry of Education of Kazakhstan has set guidelines for the implementation of international mobility. The Kazakh universities had quickly implemented mobility programs. A time of globalization of economics, trade medias, culture, science, etc., academic mobility becomes both a collective enterprise of institutions with their rules and challenges but also an act of appropriation by the individual in the situation of mobility in new socio-cultural, academic language spaces etc. In this article, we analyze the experience of the first Kazakh students who went on a study abroad program in Poland and the skills acquired by the students on their return.

I. Introduction

Après la signature de la déclaration de Bologne en 2010, le Kazakhstan est devenu le 47^e pays-membre du processus de Bologne et le premier État d'Asie centrale partie prenante de l'espace européen éducatif. Dans ce cadre, le Ministère de l'éducation du Kazakhstan a fixé des directives pour la mise en œuvre d'une mobilité internationale. Les universités kazakhstanaïses ont rapidement mis en place des programmes de mobilité. À l'heure de la mondialisation des échanges économiques, médiatiques, culturels, scientifiques, etc., la mobilité académique devient à la fois une entreprise collective des institutions avec leurs règles et leurs enjeux mais aussi un acte d'appropriation par l'individu en situation de mobilité de nouveaux espaces langagiers, socio-culturels, académiques, etc. Dans cet article nous analyserons les difficultés rencontrées par les divers acteurs d'une mobilité et les compétences acquises par ces premiers étudiants kazakhs partis en séjour d'études en Pologne à leur retour.

II. Cadre théorique

1. La notion de mobilité

La mobilité permet le développement d'une compétence européenne au travers d'une meilleure connaissance de l'autre par la découverte de nouvelles réalités culturelles européennes. Elle doit contribuer au développement d'une solidarité entre tous les Européens, renforcer une Europe du mieux-être, qui offre à tous des possibilités pour le présent et pour l'avenir. (Commission européenne, 1995)

Le soutien à la mobilité est également un facteur d'enrichissement de l'enrichissement des savoirs. La mobilité géographique élargit l'horizon individuel, stimule l'agilité intellectuelle, attire l'attention générale. Elle ne peut que renforcer l'appétit à apprendre qu'il est si nécessaire de développer aujourd'hui. (Commission européenne, 1995) Selon V. Papisiba, les étudiants reviennent du séjour, certes vainement déniaisés sur le plan personnel, ils ont pris conscience de dimensions internationales du monde contemporain, ils ont abandonné un ethnocentrisme primaire et acquis une autonomie salubre par rapport au milieu d'origine. La plupart ont appris à s'adapter, dans le sens d'« adapter les autres comme ils sont », ont passé quelques examens en se pliant au système, ont su profiter des ressources touristiques du territoire, ont noué des amitiés internationales. Des objectifs de flexibilité opérationnelle transférables pour promouvoir l'employabilité des sujets sont atteints. Si l'on assigne au programme la mission d'insuffler les bases d'une citoyenneté européenne active par la participation à la construction d'un espace identitaire tiers, où le pluriculturel signifie plus qu'une cohabitation respectueuse, les résultats restent en de dessous des investissements. (2003 : 45)

Pendant les quelques mois passés à l'étranger, les étudiants se trouvent immergés et doivent non seulement observer, mais surtout comprendre, apprendre, agir, interagir et communiquer dans un milieu très différent du leur. Il leur faut s'adapter à un autre système de valeurs universitaires, faire évoluer leurs normes et repères sociaux, construire de nouveaux liens et tester la solidité des anciens, enrichir leurs références culturelles personnelles, modifier aussi l'idée qu'ils s'étaient faite jusqu'alors des rapports et des frontières entre les appartenances nationales.

Le séjour est souvent décrit sous l'angle des démarches administratives à effectuer, des cours à suivre et à valider, des visites touristiques à faire, des repères pratiques à construire dans le quotidien. En revanche, les étudiants adoptent rarement une posture réflexive sur les aspects culturels et sur leur propre attitude face au changement du cadre de vie. Le voyage est une des pratiques susceptibles d'offrir, par la rupture avec le déjà connu et familier, un terrain pour l'étonnement et la surprise. La relation entre voyage, aventure, événement n'est pas toujours actualisée, surtout dans le contexte actuel, néanmoins elle est organique. (Papisiba, 2003 : 71)

Le voyage d'après M. Eliade de « s'oublier soi-même », c'est à faire « suspendre la problématique d'un moment spirituel donné, de renoncer aux tropismes et aux automatismes de la vie quotidienne, de sortir de soi », il appartient selon ce même auteur, « à cette difficile catégorie de faits humains que l'on nomme aventure ». (1989 : 97-102)

2. Le parcours de mobilité comme l'enrichissement personnel

Quelques mois passés à l'étranger c'est un profond enrichissement personnel qui a contribué à leur donner une plus grande maturité et dans la vie quotidienne que dans leurs parcours académiques. Une vie en terre étrangère, de côtoyer des personnes de mentalité différente et d'apprendre à penser autrement. Étudier ou travailler dans un pays étranger afin de découvrir d'autres mentalités, d'autres méthodes de travail, acquérir une certaine ouverture d'esprit. Parvenir à l'étranger, c'est aller vivre dans un monde nouveau qui diffère complètement ou partiellement de celui que vous avez pu connaître jusque là.

Une mobilité internationale produit un effet structurant et conduit à une mobilisation de l'individu appelé ainsi à jouer un rôle et à exercer activement son métier d'étudiant. En d'autres termes, le séjour Erasmus réactive ou renforce la perception par l'étudiant de son rôle d'étudiant, éveille la conscience de l'implication que nécessite le fait d'étudier dans une langue et un système différents, aiguise le sentiment d'implication personnelle, voire la conscience d'être en formation.

Toutes les négociations entre soi et le monde, soi et les autres, soi et soi, sont indites de remaniements identitaires. Par la confrontation aux situations et aux occasions d'ouverture sur l'autre, l'individu peut développer de nouvelles réponses, de nouveaux comportements, de nouvelles représentations qui lui donnent l'impression d'avoir changé.

La notion de mobilité recouvre des définitions et des réalités très diverses. Elle a été le plus souvent abordée sous des catégories, telles que mobilité « éducative, professionnelle ou migratoire », qui reprennent en fait des catégories officielles existantes. Ces analyses ont enfermé ces pratiques en situations de déplacement dans des trajectoires cloisonnées et linéaires, avec un savoir unique de lui que les organisations politiques et les sociétés d'accueil leur ont attribué ou imposé. (Papa-siba, 2003 : 38)

Au centre de ce noyau de perceptions, qui posent comme objet de connaissance de soi et ses connexions avec le monde, se trouve l'identité culturelle ou nationale. La confrontation avec la différence, avec ce qu'on n'est pas, révèle en partie ce qu'on est. Il semble que sur le chemin de la rencontre avec les autres, on se découvre ou croit se découvrir, peu importe.

Parvenir au programme signifie continuer à être étudiant à avoir un savoir qui fait l'objet d'attentes et de établissements et qui est accompagné d'obligations pour la validation de cette année d'études.

Une mobilité internationale produit un effet structurant et conduit à une mobilisation de l'individu, appelé ainsi à jouer un rôle et à exercer activement son métier d'étudiant. En d'autres termes, le séjour Erasmus réactive ou renforce la perception par l'étudiant de son rôle d'étudiant, éveille la conscience de l'implication que nécessite le fait d'étudier dans une langue et un système différents, aiguise le sentiment d'implication personnelle, voire la conscience d'être en formation.

Le séjour d'études à l'étranger apparaît comme un type d'expérience interculturelle, évoquant au premier abord une sorte de position intermédiaire entre la vision touristique et l'engagement de résidence.

À l'étranger on apprend non seulement la chose que l'on aura vu chez soi. La confrontation avec un autre système d'enseignement donne lieu à des apprentissages linguistiques. En effet, les étudiants découvrent la différence culturelle, et c'est ce qui les découvre et qui les enrichit. On sollicite les limites individuelles et le potentiel d'adaptabilité de chacun. Autrement dit, ce nouveau contexte socio-culturel offre des occasions supplémentaires à l'individu pour voir ce qu'il est capable d'entreprendre, de surmonter, de résoudre. Il semble alors nécessaire à certains égards une des voies possibles dans le chemin vers une meilleure connaissance de soi. Pour ces

(Papaŷiba, 2003 ŷ 139-163)

3. La notion de compétence, compétence langagière, compétence de communication, compétence interculturelle

Selon L. Potŷher (2011), une Cōmpçtenŷe esŷune ŷap çŷitçŷe reŷŷonnue qui permeŷd'atŷŷcomplir des atŷŷions, de rçsoudre des problçmes, de rçaliser des atŷŷŷes Cōmplexes, de

Comprendre et évaluer des situations, de prendre des décisions. Pour développer des compétences, il est bien entendu nécessaire d'avoir des connaissances dans les domaines multiples. Pour venir à bout de situations complexes, il faut non seulement maîtriser les savoirs et avoir des connaissances sur la question, mais aussi être capable de mobiliser des savoir-faire sociaux et relationnels. La compétence est la capacité de mobiliser les savoirs et les savoir-faire au bon moment pour résoudre une situation complexe (P. Perrenoud). L'approche par les compétences s'appuie sur des connaissances de tous ordres : connaissances et savoir-faire cognitifs, connaissances sociales et savoir-faire relationnels, connaissances affectives et savoir-faire émotionnel. (Pothier, 2011 : 47-48)

Quant à Marghilde Anquieil, la mobilité n'est pas seulement promesse de nouvelles expériences, elle peut aussi mener à l'aliénation, au déracinement et à l'adaptation passive aux conditions modernes de la flexibilité. La mobilité comme caractéristique culturelle de la modernité affecte globalement le public étudiant de l'université contemporaine avant même toute expérience de séjour d'études à l'étranger. La mobilité amène à une remise en question existentielle, ce qui manque trop souvent aux cursus académiques. La mobilité s'introduit dans l'université comme élément critique face au savoir comparé en modules disciplinaires en introduisant un moment de réflexion globale sur la vie sociale. Elle place les étudiants dans une position privilégiée d'apprentissage par le dépassement de soi, grâce au mouvement dialogique menant au retour vers soi d'un regard informé par le nouveau monde.

La mobilité étudiante, comme modalité formatrice globale est fortement encouragée par les institutions européennes. D'autre part, les universités ont pris la mesure de l'internationalisation de la société du savoir, et le processus de Bologne marque un moment essentiel pour l'université à son sommet et prend le relais sur la politique dans l'initiative d'europanisation du système d'éducation supérieure. L'échange étudiant fondé sur la réciprocité a été envisagé au départ comme n'apportant pas de coûts supplémentaires et n'entraînant pas de bouleversement didactique substantiel dans les systèmes nationaux. (Anquieil, 2006 : 7-10)

Une maîtrise satisfaisante de la langue peut ouvrir l'accès à la connaissance des implicites d'une culture, bien que l'acquisition des compétences linguistiques ne puisse pas faire l'économie de l'acquisition des compétences culturelles.

Les étudiants, en qui leur environnement familial, qui est aussi leur environnement familial et amical ainsi qu'un ensemble de connaissances établies jouent au long des années étouffées. La nécessité de se créer un environnement, d'interagir avec les autres, se fait alors sentir et pousse les nouveaux arrivés à rechercher de nouveaux partenaires et à créer de nouveaux réseaux de socialités. Le processus de création d'un réseau relationnel dans le temps comporte quelques conséquences. La découverte du milieu d'accueil ne s'effectue pas sans difficultés : découvrir autre chose que l'image figée et stéréotypée avec laquelle l'apprenant est arrivé, découvrir et construire un monde à un moyen de langue cible. Parler la langue dans le pays d'accueil, c'est découvrir qu'il faut intégrer tous les registres d'une langue qui n'a plus rien à voir avec la représentation d'un apprentissage fondé sur le dictionnaire et les règles fixes d'une grammaire « applicable ». Pour l'étudiant étranger, la découverte d'un nouvel environnement s'atto mpagne souvent de la détou verle simulannée de la double face de de la langue-able, à la fois tonvenionnelle eLrès souple. Tous ces aspects de la nouvelle réalité dans laquelle l'étudiantmobile va se trouver immergé, parlipenLau sensimenLde désabilisation. L'étudianten séjour d'études à l'étranger détou vre enfin sa Lriple identité linguistique : « locuteur natif de sa langue d'origine, apprenant de la langue d'accueil et bilingue. L'étudiant mobile est en état de transition, ce qui ne se passe pas sans choc affectif. » (Koller-Bally, 2001 : 125)

Pour les étudiantLséLrangers venant de « loin » Lrilingues, tonnaissent de grandes difficultés linguistiques dues à des difficultés de compréhension des codes universitaires eLplus largement de leur nouvel environnement social eLculturel, qui ont perturbé leur rapportLau français, deLle langue « aimée » eLdéjà enseignée. (Gohard-RadenkoviL, 2006 : 1)

Quelles compétences de communication tonstruire avec l'étudiantLmobilité? En réalité l'étudiantLarrive en séjour en ayant déjà acquis un certain nombre de compétences en langue dans son pays d'origine.

Pour Elizabeth Murphy-Lejeune eLGeneviève Zarak, les compétences interculturelles de mobilité désignent : « l'ensemble des dispositions, capacités et aptitudes spécifiques qui permettent à un individu de gérer ses expériences interculturelles en situation de mobilité effective. » (2003 : 43)

Les compétences interculturelles ne sont pas des niveaux à acquérir par rapportLà une progression préLonsLruiLle eLtaLégorisée en savoirs eLsavoir-faire, en raison de la complexité même de la relation à l'altérité eLdes effets, difficilement Lternables du déplacement de soi par rapportLà l'autre. Si ces desLripients sont nécessaires à l'(auL)évaluation des compétences linguistiques acquises dans la mobilité, en vue d'établir une harmonisation des Lrères au niveau européen, il serait en revanche opportun d'observer une certaine prudence quantLà la destination des compétences qui s'élaborent dans de situations d'enLre-deux linguistiques eLculturel. (Zarak, 2003, 2004).

Sur un marché des langues, obéissant de même aux impératifs d'un marché de l'emploi mondialisé, la Lendance esLgrande de vouloir évaluer des compétences interculturelles, acquises dans l'expérience de la mobilité, sur le modèle d'une certification formalisée de la langue.

Pour sa partA. De plus, les dispositifs eLles moyens mis en œuvre dans les institutions pouvantL'assurer sont très hétérogènes eLinégaux. On peut se demander quelles démarches sontLà inventer pour assurer deLle formation globale du « futur Lravailleur européen », qui passeraLnotamment par la tonnaissance de la langue eLpar la compréhension de l'autre.

4. Analyse des témoignages des étudiants à leur retour de leur séjour de mobilité en Pologne

4.1. Enquête : cadre méthodologique et corpus

Pour mener notre enquête qui s'inscrit dans une approche qualitative, nous avons choisi l'entrevue semi-directive. Notre corpus est constitué de 11 étudiants qui sont âgés de 23 à 25 ans. Ce sont des étudiants de l'Université d'Économie et de Statistique de Varsovie qui ont fait leurs études pendant un semestre en Pologne. Nous avons choisi ces étudiants parce que nous avons travaillé comme responsable des relations internationales (voir plus haut) et parce que nous avons été le moins direct des mesures qui ont été prises, de la manière dont s'est préparée la mobilité de ces étudiants, des réactions du personnel administratif, etc.

Ce séjour à l'étranger a duré un semestre et s'est déroulé à l'Université de Varsovie. Onze étudiants ont donc fait leurs études dans cette université. Dix étudiants ont été d'accord pour participer à l'entrevue. Étant nous-mêmes enseignantes-chercheuses en situation de mobilité, nous avons commenté par notre propre histoire pour créer des liens de confiance et de proximité. Il s'agit d'une entrevue semi-directive aux questions flexibles qui a donné la possibilité à nos interlocuteurs de s'exprimer librement (Blanchet & Golman, 2010 : 8).

Nos questions d'entrevue s'inscrivent principalement à leur retour :

- D'où vous est venue l'idée de participer à ce programme de mobilité ?
- Comment avez-vous compris la mobilité avant de partir ?
- Quelles difficultés avez-vous eues pendant la préparation de votre séjour de mobilité ?
- Comment trouvez-vous le système éducatif, universitaire en Europe (en Pologne) ?
- Qu'est-ce qui vous a plu, qu'est-ce qui vous a choqué durant votre séjour ?
- Quels obstacles ou difficultés avez-vous rencontrés ?
- Quels profils avez-vous tirés de votre expérience de mobilité ? quelles compétences avez-vous acquises pendant le séjour de mobilité ?
- Quels sont, d'après vous, les besoins des étudiants qui partent en mobilité ?

L'objectif de cette enquête est donc d'analyser, après leur séjour à l'étranger, les représentations des étudiants sur leur pays d'études, sa(s) langue(s), sa(s) culture(s), son(s) système(s) éducatif(s), son(s) peuple(s), etc., d'identifier leurs perceptions de leur expérience universitaire et quotidienne, de déterminer les facteurs (bagages, parcours, expériences antérieures, stratégies élaborées sur place) qui ont pu contribuer au fait qu'ils aient bien ou mal vécu cette première expérience de mobilité.

Dans ce travail nous analyserons les réponses de deux étudiants, leurs difficultés rencontrées et les compétences acquises à travers la mobilité. L'encouragement à la mobilité des étudiants est également étayé par la valorisation de la doctrine du capital humain qui considère, d'un point de vue social, que l'investissement dans l'enseignement et l'acquisition des compétences est un facteur aussi important pour la croissance économique que l'investissement dans des équipements matériels. (Dzamdzhieva, 2004 ; Papašiba, 2003 : 23). Les étudiants se heurtent à divers obstacles dans leur parcours.

Pour la question comment comprenez-vous la mobilité académique la réponse est la suivante :

Arzu, 24 ans, spécialité de droit :

1. La mobilité académique est la possibilité, à l'aide de la connaissance et de l'obstination, d'avoir la chance d'aller à l'étranger et recevoir une formation et une certaine expérience. L'idée de participer à la mobilité est venue graduellement, à la fois, en apprenant au début qu'il y a un tel programme et que celui qui parle anglais et qui a les certificats IELTS peut prendre part au concours. La plupart ne croyaient pas à la réalité de la mobilité. Nos professeurs ont commencé à interroger ceux qui étudient l'anglais et ainsi de suite. Puis, c'est devenu intéressant, mais il était un peu difficile d'imaginer l'enseignement à l'étranger. Ensuite deux des professeurs ont activement commencé à nous faire participer à ce processus. Ils nous ont convoqué et ainsi de suite.

Comme nous avons vu, ce sont les professeurs qui ont encouragé ce étudiant à présenter son dossier à ce programme.

2. Tout a commencé d'une manière assez intéressante et assez simple. Nous sommes arrivés à l'université et soudain on nous a proposé de penser à la mobilité. Merci à ces gens qui m'ont stimulé et qui m'ont donné la motivation. Dès lors, nous avons commencé la préparation, en essayant d'apprendre obstinément l'anglais.

Le étudiant partage avec ses impressions de mobilité et les compétences acquises comme suit :

La mobilité académique m'a donné la possibilité d'acquérir une expérience, de comprendre une autre culture, de faire connaissance avec des gens nouveaux, des personnalités, et même avec les gens simples, qui au moins pouvaient nous aider.

À vrai dire, je ne sais pas, je sais seulement qu'il faut travailler. Je voudrais progresser dans ma spécialité juridique, s'il serait honnête d'une manière intéressante d'avoir la possibilité de visiter une autre culture en faisant un stage. Tâcher de comprendre et d'entrer dans un autre système rapidement.

Dans le cas A. Gohard-Radenković dit que lorsqu'un mobile se trouve obligatoirement confronté à de nouvelles situations et de nouvelles expériences. Il va les interpréter, en mobilisant des ressources et faire appel aux acquis dans le groupe social, et en même temps en œuvre des stratégies d'adaptation, le plus souvent inconscientes, en regard de ces appartenances et de son vécu, mais aussi en regard des valeurs et des espaces d'intégrabilité que lui offriront les sociétés d'accueil. (2006 : 10)

4.2. Les difficultés rencontrées

Selon P. Koller-Bally, malgré les principes et les directives qui régissent les

Échanges, l'étudiant qui par son séjour d'études, sera donc démuné et ressentira un certain malaise face à ses difficultés pour étudier la culture du pays d'accueil comme s'il n'était ni prêt, ni préparé au séjour ; il demande de l'aide, des « clés » pour ouvrir les portes du « Nouveau Monde ». L'immersion et le programme d'échange ne peuvent véritablement se faire sans cette imposition qu'est l'apprentissage guidé à la communication interculturelle qui sert de dynamique à la construction d'une compétence linguistique et à l'acquisition de nouveaux savoir-faire langagiers. Mais la demande de l'étudiant va plus loin encore. (2001 / 3-4)

Arzu: La seule difficulté était pendant la préparation du visa. De la part du personnel administratif, nous avons besoin d'un effort de compréhension envers les étudiants, pour qu'il se rende compte comment nous vivons à l'étranger.

J'attends l'aide linguistique et culturelle de l'administration. Il n'y a pas de difficultés spéciales, mais les gens d'ici, tâchaient de nous aider et de nous comprendre. Il arrive de connaître des gens différents. La seule difficulté était de comprendre le polonais.

Un étudiant s'est heurté au problème linguistique. Il a pensé que tous les gens en Pologne peuvent communiquer en anglais.

Une autre étudiante Sabine a répondu à ces questions comme suit :

Sabrine, 24 ans, spécialité de pédagogie. Comment se comporter dans un pays étranger ? Comment utiliser le plan de la ville, jusqu'à ce temps, je ne l'avais jamais fait. A l'avenir je veux poursuivre ma carrière dans la pédagogie et être professionnelle dans mon domaine. Nous avons visité d'autres villes étrangères, mais Varsovie était devenue comme notre ville natale. En Pologne, peu de gens parlent anglais. Ils parlent dans la rue le polonais et nous n'avons rien compris. Au fur et à mesure, nous avons commencé à deviner les mots qui ressemblent au russe, et après nous avons appris les mots de survie. Enfin, je rentre dans mon pays avec un gros bagage de connaissances. Mon père, ma mère et mes proches m'ont manqué.

Comme nous avons vu, les étudiants ont rencontré des difficultés culturelles et langagières. Mais au fur à mesure, ils ont surmonté ces barrières. Ils ont amélioré le niveau de langue, les connaissances en général. Ce parcours de mobilité a donné la chance de rencontrer d'autres gens. Pour communiquer avec l'autre ils ont dû entrer en communication interculturelle qui d'une part enrichit le bagage culturel de ces étudiants.

Conclusion

Comme nous l'avons vu, un élément joue un rôle majeur dans cette expérience : nos étudiants n'étaient pas du tout préparés à la mobilité. En reprenant une période d'étude à l'étranger est hautement profitable, sur le plan personnel, académique et social. Au contact d'un autre pays, l'étudiant développe ses capacités d'adaptation, de communication interculturelle, ainsi que ses connaissances européennes. Il bénéficie, également, d'un sérieux ajout en termes d'insertion professionnelle.

Le mobile représente en premier lieu un remplissage, un capital de compétences, pour une éventuelle activité professionnelle dans un autre pays. Elle est également grâce à la circulation des personnes et aux contacts qu'elle établit un moyen de libre circulation des idées dans l'espace européen. En favorisant l'apprentissage réciproque, la comparaison, et la confrontation des expériences, la libre circulation contribue sans doute à l'émergence d'une conscience européenne ouverte et tolérante. Ayant vécu dans un autre société et dans un autre culture on peut se (re)définir, se (re)découvrir (Papașiba, 2003 : 107-108). Il faudra prendre en compte cette expérience des étudiants et la réinvestir au service des futurs étudiants de mobilité.

English, the Lingua Franca for the European Union

ABSTRACT

In an increasingly demanding world, the need to share key resources such as coal, steel and oil brought together several European countries. These countries decided to sign in 1957, a treaty that led to the formation of Little Europe. Since then Little Europe grew and transformed in what we all refer to as the European Union.

Unity in diversity is the key element that provides the four freedoms guaranteed within the European Union (EU). These four freedoms are “free movement of goods, labour, services and capital” (2011: 121) to which we can add the freedom of culture and the protection of each country’s native language.

Although the Union guarantees free access to information in all languages for each member state, statistics show that English is preferred in the Union’s official documents, debates and conferences. As a consequence, this policy can lead to the globalization of English. This paper is a compelling study to discover the factors that influenced this rapid spread of English in Europe and if English is or will become lingua franca for the European Union.

KEYWORDS: Lingua Franca, European Union, freedom, cultural diversity

Historical overview: the rise of the British Empire

Originally, the term lingua franca designated a common language used by the Arabic speakers in their conversations with travellers from Western Europe. Later, its meaning extended and described the language of commerce which enabled traders to understand each other. This last meaning is applicable to the status that English language has in nowadays, including, of course, its global dimension. English became lingua franca not only for traders worldwide but also for a large number of non-native speakers from different domains of activity.

This powerful British influence began long time before Great Britain joined the European Union. More precisely, Shakespeare’s English became known outside its borders along with the formation of the British Empire. If we take a glance in the European history we notice a huge dominance of British authorities over several territories that covered parts of Europe, North America and Asia.

The first British colonies or dominions were: “Canada, New Zealand and Australia” (Redaelli & Invernizzi, 2011: 96), which, later, along with other regions became the founding members of Commonwealth. In nowadays, Commonwealth still exists but it was transformed into “an association between Great Britain and 54 nations which are ex – colonies.” (Idem: 96)

It was this association or gathering of territories from different parts of the world that increased English’s popularity and usage. The British Empire gave English the opportunity to become official throughout all its colonies, turning it into a colonial language. It gradually became the language of administration, education and trade for all the Empire’s member states, including two densely populated ones: India and Nepal.

India also known as the jewel of the Crown remained under the British dominance until 1947 fact which led to a massive spread of English language and customs. English was and remained the second spoken language in a country with an estimated population of over 1.27 billion inhabitants. Statistics show that English gained a national status in India. It is the language of educated, young Indians and it is considered a link or a linguistic bridge between India and other parts of the world.

Even if India did not adopt English as its mother tongue, another territory (in the beginning only some parts from North America) took and modified traditional British English into “General American as referred to in various publications... although there is a broad distinction between American and British English, even though there are obvious variations within these countries.” (Russell, 2001: 85)

Such variations occur basically in vocabulary and often, in other words, British English or more precisely, the British accent was transformed and reinvented, becoming American English or American accent. On its turn, even American English or General American adapted itself according to the region, so, several American regions developed their own unique accent.

Another important even that enabled English’s popularity and usage was:

The rapid development in public broadcasting after about 1920 led in England and abroad to the establishment of BBC English as a default spoken standard. This standard, alternatively known as Received Pronunciation, is that of a social and educational elite... [This]... ensured that no non-standard or dialectal variants would henceforth be considered sub-standard – that is not simply different, but inferior.

(Burnley, 1995: 25)

Besides British, American and Standard English there are other derivations from the original language such as Canadian, Australian, Scottish English and many others. All these variations “have vocabularies that are basically British with an admixture of distinctive local terms and an increasing stock of Americanisms. They also have their own accents but there is little dialect variation.” (Russell, 2001: 86)

Some of these variations and dialects of English appeared, probably, during the British Empire when English registered the most spectacular progress. “It was during the Empires period when Europe wanted to become a cultural model for the rest of the world. Spanish and Portuguese conquered the Latin – American territory, French gained parts of Canada and Africa, but the British succeeded in establishing the largest empire worldwide.” (Berskin & Milza, 1992: 78) This massive spread of the British Empire played a huge role in the evolution of the English language as we know it today. It came the language of trade, business, stocks and shares, employment, education and in nowadays it is used as a universal tool of communication for people from different environments, with different backgrounds, no matter the gender.

English as a colonial language colonized and was colonized, transcending cultures and becoming something that arises out of “the work, needs, ties, joys, affections, tastes of long generations of humanity.” (Russell, 2001: 89)

It was the British Empire that set the basis of English’s popularity that we are all facing today.

English and the European Union

Some of the first steps that showed the desire and need to form a common European market were made soon after the end of the Second World War. Six European countries decided to unify their markets and key resources by signing the Treaty of Paris in 1951. Since then France, Germany, Belgium, Italy (Luxemburg) and the Netherlands shared “production of coal and steel.” (Redaelli & Invernizzi, 2011: 120)

Later on, by signing the Treaty of Rome in 1957, the founding members mentioned above created the European Economic Community. The EEC main purpose was the establishment of a common economic market and a policy that enables people and goods to move freely within the Community. Over the years, several other European countries decided to join the European Community and in 1973 it was Great Britain’s turn.

The entry of Great Britain in the Community “really marked the end of its imperial era. However, some traces of imperialism still continued. For example Hong Kong remained a British dependency until 1997.” (Idem: 12)

Even if the original form of the British Empire disappeared, the sovereignty of English language grew.

This sovereignty is based on recent statistics which show the real spread of English. Two out of three European adults declare that they know English at an intermediate level and almost one of five say they are proficient.

Even in Brussels – the headquarters of the European Union there have been rumours that there is an increasing demand of having a single official language. This need to simplify documents, procedures and debates has in its background the monetary policy of the Union. When you speak about translation in the European Union you have to take into account millions of euro spent on interpreters from every member state.

All these costs could be reduced by simply declaring an official language for the Union. This would mean that all member states will agree to use an effective information from the EU in a single, recognized, accepted and official language.

Although English is consistently being used and several European officials admitted that it has become lingua franca or a common communication code not only for the young but also for older generations, there are several legal aspects that slow down or make impossible the courageous project of declaring English the official language for the Union.

One of these legal aspects is the profound undemocratic gesture if English or any other language were to be imposed as an official language for the Union. Despite the fact that the global number of non-native speakers of English is substantially larger than its native speakers (over 4:1), the European Union will not risk declaring English its official language for such a big and diverse community.

Perhaps, in time, if things were seen from a new perspective then English might have a chance to be recognized as lingua franca for the Union. Declaring an official language for the Union's members does should be considered as an effective communication tool that is meant to unite rather than separate nations. This scenario can be possible if we take into consideration that the European Union already has a unique currency. This currency – the Euro is recognized by all member states and is the official monetary reference for EU. Therefore, why not declaring the Union's official language?

English Lingua Franca in Romania: Personal Perspective

Before the Romanian revolution from 1989, on our territory there were a few other linguistic trends than in the present days. Many generations learned foreign languages like Russian, French and Latin. If you ask our parents, not to mention our grandparents, they will simply say that they did not have English among their educational subjects nor did they hear about it until recently.

After 1989, Romanian people started to have access to American and British culture. Romanian TV channels, magazines and newspapers were bombarded with English songs (artists), movies, articles on different subjects, quotes, online English books and online socializing networks.

Along with this new English trend, the Latin and Russian boom turned to dust at least in Romania. Nevertheless, French language continues to be taught in Romanian educational institutions and it can be ranked as the second foreign language if we take into consideration the number of people who learn it.

My generation (those who nowadays are aged between 30-35 years old) had access to this new foreign language – English. English was taught since primary school and it came along with modern and attractive course books. From what I can remember during my English classes everything was fun and interesting.

The English teacher used visual and audio techniques that fascinated us. We learned English from posters, pictures, drawings and audio cassettes which came to support the course book. Later, during the 8th grade, I and my former classmates discovered the pop music culture which was promoted on Romanian, American and British TV channels. Our music idols were bands like Backstreet Boys, U2 or Spice Girls. We used to learn by hearing our favourite songs and play karaoke during school breaks. Even when it came to buying clothes we preferred those that had English messages or printed images of British and American celebrities. And, there were, of course, movies or TV serials like Indiana Jones, Dr. Quinn, Verdict: Murder or the famous soap opera Dallas all in English, promoting indirectly not only the language but also the British-American lifestyle.

In conclusion almost everything that surrounded my generation revolved around English or had an English connotation. Since then things have not changed a lot, on the contrary, the spread of English in our country increased. In my case, I am still surrounded by English not only due to my work but also due to my three year old boy. All my son's favourite cartoon characters are of British or American origin.

He is fascinated by Mickey Mouse, Minnie, Goofy, Angry Birds, Spiderman and Sportacus. He likes to listen to the English Mickey song and tries to sing along. While watching a cartoon with Spiderman he simply asked me Mom, why is he called Spiderman? What does it mean? My answer (the Romanian translation) was, for sure, his first English lesson.

Moreover, I have noticed that several audio-toys from famous brands use English texts to designate numbers, animals, and types of vehicles or flowers. Even the songs that these toys reproduce are in English having a huge impact on my son who tries to memorize lyrics from songs such as Merry Christmas, Jingle Bells or Old McDonald.

Moving on, I recently discovered that my son became aware of the gadgets that we have in our house. He quickly learned how to turn on and off the laptop although the directions are in English. He started playing online games for kids his age and he began to understand what he is asked to do in those games even if they have English terminology. Games like Candy Crush Saga or My Tom (a virtual game downloaded directly on your mobile phone in which you have to take care of a pet) have the audio part in English.

Although such examples can go on, I will stop here by saying that from my point of view, my experience with the use of English on a daily basis can be generalized even in the case of Romanian people who are in their 50's or more. Several educational institutions have accessed European funds in order to teach English to elders. There are English courses that support grandparents to cross the linguistic and virtual barriers that arise in their communication with grandchildren. These courses are addressed to grandparents or parents who have their siblings located in different parts of the world and English is their only linguistic bond. So, English has a huge impact not only on my son's generation but also on older Romanian generations.

For my son's generation English language tends to be quickly assimilated as what could be a second mother – tongue. Getting in touch from such an early age, with a foreign language helps the child develop his cognitive and creative abilities. It is also a good way to prepare the young to live and work in a global world that should have no linguistic barriers. Such linguistic barriers are already being broken by several English terms that have entered the Romanian vocabulary. Such terms are assimilated in our daily vocabulary, creating 'quick colonization'. For instance, a simple example that clearly shows how vivid, modern and easily assimilated is English, is the term selfie. I came across this term a few days ago when I heard it in a Romanian TV show. I did not get its exact meaning and usage but later I have noticed that many people use it in online posts from different socializing networks.

Selfie stands for pictures taken of you – sort of like a picture portrait made by you – which is uploaded on these networks. You can take a selfie whenever and wherever you like either as a close-up or as a reflection of you in the mirror. The same term also appears in bizarre combinations like 'I will give unlike a selfie on writing' (the last term refers to a social network Twitter).

Selfie stands as a salient when we speak about English as Lingua Franca not only for officials from the European Union but also for ordinary people. English suffers in crossing barriers and consequently increases its popularity.

To conclude, English language can be seen as a universal tool of communication. The fact that it became or becomes lingua franca may be, no longer, a double-edged sword. There are, of course, some questions that arise along with its supremacy. Is English threatening multilingualism? Will linguistic diversity in a global society tend to be united in every aspect?

What will happen to this rapid evolution of English? Will English maintain its supremacy or will this trend fade away as it happened with the Latin language? Is Chinese language a viable competitor for English?

Will Chinese replace English in popularity and number of non-native speakers considering the fact that China has the biggest population worldwide?

Discourse Features of Numerals in Commercial Magazine Ads

ABSTRACT

Based on a corpus of approximately 100 commercial magazine ads in a Glamour (UK edition) issue of December 2013, the article analyses a noteworthy presence among the morphological units in the copy of ads, which is that of numerals. These are necessary if advertisers wish to qualify their offer in a precise manner: price, dimensions, percentage of substances in a product, technical specifications, the length of tradition in the manufacturing of a product, call-back surveys etc. Different persuasive means are identified across a range of examples, which illustrate, yet again, an alignment of the British advertising discourse with the country's general cultural profile; there is a tendency towards offering fact-based information in communication in what has been termed by Trompenaars as an environment with a "Low context communication" orientation. The schematic structure of the layout is focused around numerals. In pragmatic terms, numbers are frequently used in ads in order to entail little and imply a lot, as advertisers' manipulative art often does, relying on the public to apply conversational maxims. Numbers gain iconic value, both deriving from and consolidating a consumerist ideology in which the product is frenziedly measured, counted, sold and acquired, determined to prove that it is worth the while.

KEYWORDS: commercial advertisements, numerals, scalar implicatures, conative function

Based on a corpus of 97 commercial magazine ads in a Glamour (UK edition) issue of December 2013, the article analyses a noteworthy presence among the morphological units in the copy of ads, which is that of numerals. Among the 97 display ads in the magazine, 45 have been identified as containing numerals; by following an analysis of the cases in which these numerals occur, some discourse features of advertisements will be underlined, especially those concerned with the fulfilment of the conative, persuasive function.

Generally speaking, the background culture of these ads, namely British culture, has been termed as Low context communication (LDC), in opposition to a High context communication culture, such as that of Italy or Romania. David Kaplan (1999) explained how in a Low context communication environment, which had to accommodate to unaccustomed generations of immigrants, communication tends to rely more heavily on facts. The opposite of this, High context communication, of the Indian type, has a preference for the "unspoken", for underlying meanings whose grasping is taken for granted, due to a greater uniformity in the background of its members.

As the author maintains,

[...] for most products, an LDD culture is going to expect more attention paid to the text both in terms of eye-catching wordplay and in terms of factual information. An HD culture will focus more on the overall picture and the aesthetics or feelings created by the advert

(Kalan, 1999: 194)

In comparing two ads in English and in Italian for the same product, namely a washing machine, the same author notes that the former focuses more on practical information, technical details, the price, conditions of payment etc., while the Italian ad provides no such information, it is vague regarding the question of price, and wants to create a desirable image of the product by flattering the target public.

Thus, as the most obvious means for conveying concrete, measurable information, it is only obvious that the numeral will hold a prominent place in the economy of these British ads.

Corpus analysis

The first analysed case is that of a Lancôme ad for dark spot correctors. Part of it reads as follows:

We note that the modified ordinal numeral “the first” designates novelty and uniqueness, while the determiner “our”, a possessive adjective, ascribes these qualities to the promoter of the product. Other examples from the corpus can be given to illustrate the same idea:

(Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013 Cover pp. 2-3)

Prime for the very first time a Smashbox (Idem: 77) – together with the adverbial determiner “very”, the ordinal numeral underlines the novelty of the product

The first skin idealiser by Vichy (Idem: 46)

The first reusable permanent hair colour (Idem: 202)

Coming back to the Lançôme ad, we have the following:

SO POWERFUL THAT 2 OUT OF 3 WOMEN WOULD DARE TO BARE THEIR SKIN (Idem: 1)

The construction “2 out of 3 women” can be analysed in pragmatic terms, and for that we need to remember about the Maxim of Quantity:

1. Make your contribution as informative as is required (for the current purposes of the exchange).
2. Do not make your contribution more informative than is required.

(Yule, 1996: 37)

By flouting the Maxim of Quantity, the above construction implicates that a great number (two thirds) of women in general would feel more confident after using the product. At the same time, the mentioning of the small print call-back survey (“Self assessment average on 3 DreamTone products: 209 women” (Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: cover page 2)) acts as a disclaimer, by cancelling the above implicature through the provision of an entailment “2 out of 3 women among those in the 209-subject survey”. What is interesting is that while the presence of the entailment acts as a disclaimer for the advertiser, it is not clear whether or not the target public will process the information about the effect of cancelling the implicature, as this depends on every subject's reasoning abilities.

At this point, we also need to bring in to our discussion the terms of scalar implicature and granularity.

About the former, George Yule explains: “The basis of scalar implicature is that, when any form in a scale is asserted, the negative of all forms higher on the scale is implicated.” (Yule, 1996: 41)

Therefore, the author claims, considering the scale:

<few, some, many, most, all>

By choosing to utter “There were some students in the hall”, the speaker cancels the implicatures “no many”, “no most”, “no all”.

Regarding granularity,

[it] can be understood as the density of representation points on a measurement scale. [...] In western culture, and in particular in languages with a decimal number system, the most frequently used granularity levels are those based on powers of ten. Also possible are scales constructed from these by operations of halving (resulting in the optimal refinement of a scale) and doubling. [...] Values corresponding to points on

Coarser-grained scales, in being interpreted less precisely, may be useful for face-saving if one speaks in approximate terms, one is not committed to such high precision and is less likely to be inadvertently misleading.

(Cummins/Sauerland/Solz 2012: 140-1)

Back to our example, “2 out of 3 women” also triggers a scalar implicature of the type: “no 3 out of 3”, namely “not all”. Nevertheless, since on the granularity level represented by the figures 2 and 3, the designated mathematical value (“two thirds”) is quite high, the overall effect is still positive.

Regarding the figure “209” in the disclaimer mentioned above (“Self assessment average on 3 DreamTone products: 209 women” (Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: cover page 2)), the granularity established on the level of hundreds by the value 200 is in stark contrast with the figure 9, which refines granularity to a higher degree, as it skips the level of tens to that of units ($100 < 10 < 1$). In conclusion, the refinement of granularity suggests scientific accuracy in measuring the effectiveness of the product. This, in turn, triggers positive associations, even if the disclaimer should cancel the above implicature (that a great number of women in general would feel more confident after using the product).

In the same ad, we have the following comments:

70% saw a visible reduction in Dark Spots

The enumeration of the survey results further develops the idea of scientific accuracy, by manifesting a concern for detail. Moreover, on a scale from 1 to 100, the values ranging from 70 to 84 are still quite high, even if implicating “not 100” (a scalar implicature), a fact which also adds positive associations. We note similar examples in our corpus, in an ad for a moisturiser, or in one for skin serum:

91% of UK women felt their skin was soothed.

Marie Claire survey, 131 consumers, 2010. (Idem: 198)

3 out of 5 women would wear less make-up.

62% of women agree. Self-assessment 76 women. (Idem: 48)

Regarding the appearance of the lexicon in the same ad, we note that the use of Arabic numerals at the beginning of sentences is a mark of the lexicon informality: “Do not begin a sentence with an Arabic numeral.” (Burghfield, 1998: 535)

We can analyse a further example in order to demonstrate how implicatures can function in processing an ad and how consumers are consequently attracted:

At the Body Shop, we're spreading joy this Christmas by giving every Glamour reader a free Joy Card. Come in-store to discover what's on yours. Each card is worth at least £3 off pampering treats at the body shop.

Yours could be worth £15, or even £100.

As well as a treat for you, your car d could be worth £1000 for our charity partner,

TEENAGE AND GIRL TRUST

JOY AND

What's yours worth?

£3, £15, or £100 (Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: 113)

It is noteworthy to analyse how the phrase “at least”, as a pre-determiner for the numeral, is used for hedging. The following explanation is provided:

‘At least’ signals the speaker’s unwillingness or inability to give a precise answer. This precludes a scalar implicature from arising, as the epistemic condition on the speaker is not met [...] the notion of the speaker’s uncertainty, or reluctance, is pragmatically derived from the choice of ‘at least n’ rather than the bare numeral n, because the latter would carry the implicature of certainty (‘exactly n’).

(Cummins/Sauerland/Solà 2012: 137)

Similarly, according to the same authors, the opposite of “at least”, e.g. “more than”, “fewer than”, acting as pre-determiners for numerals, also express the speaker’s reluctance, being used, in our opinion, as hedging devices. More precisely, as George Yule (1996: 38) maintains, hedges are expressions which limit the accuracy of the main statement. Cummins et al develop the idea as follows:

We argue that ‘more than n’ and ‘fewer than n’ do in fact give rise to scalar implicatures, and that the same is true of superlative quantifiers. However, we propose that these implicatures are restricted by the granularity of the numerical scale and by considerations of contextual salience of the numeral.

(Cummins et al. 2012: 139)

In our case, the phrase containing a modified numeral, “at least £3”, signals the advertiser’s unwillingness to state a figure which is higher than 3, and this acts as a disclaimer in case a customer’s car is not worth more than £3. At the same time, the context provides two other possible values of these cards: “£15” and “£100”, these representing the granularity of the scale on which implicatures can rise, with 100 being its highest value.

In the phrase “even £100”, the adverb even, a pre-determiner for the numeral 100, acts as a presupposition trigger: we understand that 100 is a value which is high enough to be desirable in those circumstances.

The text also signals that the utterance may not fully adhere to the Maxim of Quality. According to Yule (1996), this Gricean maxim is enunciated as follows:

The Maxim of Quality:

Try to make your contribution one that is true.

1. Do not say what you believe to be false.
2. Do not say that for which you lack adequate evidence.

(Yule, 1996: 37)

In the utterance “Yours could be worth £15, or even £100.”, “could” is an epistemic modal also acting as a hedge (see above), limiting the precision of the main statement. Therefore, there is no guarantee that a card will have a certain value, a fact that is further developed by a direct question addressed to the public, which invites them to find out the answer through direct involvement: “What’s yours worth? £3, £15, or £100.”

We also note that the presence of the conjunction “or” in the enumeration gives rise to a similar implication: the value of the card will be restricted to one of the enumerated values; it will not be of the type “£3, £15, and £100”. Thus, by being offered the possibility of winning the highest value from a choice of three, the reader is enticed and lured into action, i.e. involvement with the brand.

The numbers found in an ad for shampoo can also be analysed in pragmatic terms:

UP TO 100% Flake Free. Head & Shoulders. (Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: 56)

In order for this claim to be relevant to the public’s wish for healthy or good-looking hair, the utterance implicates that your hair will be 100% flake-free, by flouting the *maxim of relation*². But the prepositional phrase “up to,” which predetermines the numeral, acts as a disclaimer, in case the product does not prove to have 100% effectiveness. Thus, valid entailments which could be derived are: “10% flake-free”; “50% flake-free”; “99% flake-free,” with the number value ranging anywhere from 1 to 100%.

Therefore, the formulaic claim implicates a low and entails very little, exploiting a fine line of reasoning between what makes a valid statement or not, between what one can or cannot be held accountable for. Moreover, we note that “UP TO” is in small print, therefore even less likely to be protested.

Other examples from the corpus function in the same manner:

Slay salon-smooth with up to 48 hours of frizz control. (Idem: 197)
Up to 24 hour wear. (Idem: 201)

The occurrence of a numeral in the brand name of a product can create an aura of mystery. For example, we have an ad for a Danel perfume:

N° 5. ‘A drop of N° 5 and nothing else’.
N° 5. Danel. Paris. Parfum (Idem: 2-3)

In addition to the idea of Frenchness triggered by the words “Paris” and “Parfum” (the French word for “perfume”), the figure 5 is cryptic for the ordinary consumer, it is enigmatic and adds to the idea of sophistication. On the other hand, if it arouses one’s curiosity, some research in the area can lead to the following result:

Laid out here in undulating lines, she [Danel] found repeated interestingly the pattern of the number five, sometimes in the shape of stars. Sometimes, it was there in the shape of flowers. The number five she believed profoundly in its magic and its beauty.

(Mazzeo, 2010: 9)

Investing time in solving such mystery results in getting more involved with the brand, which is a positive thing for advertisers.

The same technique of using numbers in a cryptic manner can be further noted in our corpus, also in a brand name:

Eau de Lato s.c. L.12.12 (Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: 43)

These numbers are part of a code which is explained on the Lato s.c. official website:

L for Lato s.c., 1 to describe the fabric, péplé, 2 for the short-sleeve design (for a long sleeve it would be 1312), and finally 12, the number of versions presented to René Lato s.c.³

With the exception of the brand enthusiasts, it is highly unlikely that the general public will be aware of its significance. Therefore, as in the previous example, the presence of the numbers in the brand name can allow for two scenarios:

a. It gives the brand an air of mystery and secrecy; since it is a men's product, the code-like name might be appealing in terms of a challenge, as the mystery needs uncovering;

b. The cryptic brand name might arouse the public's curiosity and determine us to look for its significance in the most obvious and handy place, which is the company website. This second scenario is plausible in an age when Internet access is widely available, thus triggering, from our part, a higher degree of involvement with the brand.

Another case of numeral occurrence in ads is represented by the indication of addresses in *calls to action*⁴:

27 Old Bond St London. 76-80 King's Mansher (Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: 4)

Thus, consumers get practical information about how to respond to the ad. In our case, the address where the products can be purchased is provided, i.e. the address of Donna Karan fashion house outlets in London and Manchester.

Other practical details can be indicated as well by numerals in calls to action:

Shop by 10 PM for next day delivery to home. (Idem: 44)

The number indicates the time by which a certain service can be accessed, and the preposition "by" preceding the numeral in this imperative sentence conveys an idea of urgency.

Indication of a date can also signal limited availability for a product, e.g.:

offer ends 26/11/2013 (Idem: 205)

A telephone number can be provided in a call to action, in which the readers are urged to try out or order the product

Try it now. 0800 599 9200 (Idem: 109)

Here we note the direct address to the public. The structure containing the telephone number is elliptical, as we do not have an explicit instruction of the type: “Try all 0800 599 9200 to try it now / for your free sample / to place an order etc.”

The telephone number of the distributor can also simply be stated, without even a hint of what it could be used for:

Distributed by Sequel UK 01604 678940 (Idem: 13)

This happens because the public has already been trained with this kind of discourse, and they know from experience what a telephone number can be used for in an ad. In pragmatic terms, the maxim of quantity has been flouted and we derive the implicature, the advertisers' intended meaning, through what we perceive as being relevant in the context.

A practical detail is also represented by numerals which indicate an age limit for those who use the product, in statements which act as disclaimers at the same time. For example, an ad for baby milk:

Apamil. Follow On milk should only be used as part of a mixed diet and not as a breast milk substitute before 6 months. (Idem: 169)

On the other hand, numerals can also indicate a suitable age for using the product. Thus, in the same ad for baby milk, the subject in the picture is identified in the caption:

Hayden, aged 6 months. (Idem: 169)

A number can be noted in the copyright notice, which is printed on the display ad⁵⁷:

Guess©2013 (Idem)

Here the number represents the year of the first publication of the copyrighted work (2013), accompanying the copyright symbol (©), together with an identification of the copyright owner (“Guess”).

Such instance is not isolated in our corpus: “©2013 SWAROWSKI AG” (Idem: 74), and these details are indicators of a culture in which the commercialization of products is highly regulated, and where nothing happens or is displayed by chance; the practicality of the advertising discourse transpires, the fact that it functions with the definite purpose of selling something to its large public.

Further on, we have an ad for women's fashion accessories: "it's the glitzy things that count. HOLIDAY 2013" (Idem: 25). The number is part of a noun phrase, designating the current year (the ad is from a 2013 issue of the magazine), thus underlining the relevance of the product in terms of keeping up with the latest trends in fashion. In association with the noun "holiday", which triggers positive associations for the modern woman, it constitutes an example of *block language*⁶.

An interesting example is that of numbers occurring in *elliptical constructions*⁷ in order to indicate product prices:

Dress £40. Shoes £32. Necklace £30 (Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: 44)

In this case we deal with an *initial and medial ellipsis*⁸, having the structure noun + the pound symbol + cardinal numeral, with the article and the verb being omitted (normally, these constructions would have been as follows: "The dress costs £40. The shoes cost £32. The necklace costs £30.") If we think about the economy of the text and following the layout versus image, the product price occupies a central position, underlying its importance.

We note another examples in ads indicating the product price to gain the adverb "only" as a pre-determiner along with the numeral, in order to stress the attractiveness of the price, e.g.:

Only £10 RRP. (Idem: 201)

Similarly, the adverb "just" pre-determining numerals presupposes that the value denoted by the numeral is a low price to pay for a certain product, e.g.:

Spend just £39. (Idem: 228)

The indication of price can also be analysed pragmatically, such as in the following:

bracelet from £49 (Idem: 74).

This flows the maxim of quantity: "from £49 to ... how much?" It implicates that £49 is the lowest price at which a product can be purchased, and that the price is affordable.

Numbers are used to represent some other details. In an ad for solar lotion, the number indicates the value of the solar protection factor:

Healthy Glow Sheer Powder SPF 15 (Idem: 18)

This is a technical term, signalling the fact that the ad is targeted at educated women, who make informed choices.

In an ad for Vichy skin serum, numbers are part of a code which designates the chemical ingredients of the product

New. Idealia Life Serum [LR2412+LHA]. (Idem: 48)

But we can only understand what the code stands for by checking the company website for clarification, even if no such call to action is provided (e.g. “Visit our website at www.vichy.com...”)

Enriched with a unique combination of LR2412+LHA molecules, the formula helps transform and protect skin exposed to stress, pollution, smoke or an unbalanced diet

This complicated formula suggests scientific accomplishment, therefore a highly effective product. The formula being also intriguing, we are again dealing with a case in which we are led to get more involved with the brand in order to solve the dilemma.

Numbers indicating the chemical composition of a product suggests scientific rigour. A further example is that of an ad for weight loss tablets

Per daily dosage: 3000 mg glucomannan
400 mg green coffee bean
200 mg raspberry ketone
(Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: 284)

The effectiveness of the product can also be indicated through numerals in terms of time. Thus, a Garnier moisturizer

Covers imperfections with 24hr hydration and SPF protection. (Idem: 87)

Acting as a predeterminer in a noun phrase, the numeral indicates the length of time during which the product has the desired effect

In the following example, the numeral is one of the predeterminers in a noun phrase

A gaggle of eight lightweight leave-in conditioning sprays packed with lush extracts of Aussie eucalyptus. (Idem: 63)

The noun phrase “a gaggle of” refers to “a noisy group of people”, or “a group of geese”¹⁰. The numeral supports the unusual, fresh association between “hair sprays” and “noisy group” by providing a figure which can normally designate a “group.”

In an ad for Folli Follie accessories, the numeral is part of the opening phrase, where “L! girl” refers to “a fashionable and attractive young woman, especially one from a rich upper-class family, who is well-known because she goes to a lot of fashionable events that people read about in newspapers and magazines.” (Longman Dictionary of Contemporary English, 2009: 935)

‘IT’ GIRL RULE #7

WEAR IT YOUR WAY (Glamour (British) No 153 December 2013: 91)

The numeral acts as a post-determiner in a noun phrase, which introduces the tagline (“WEAR IT YOUR WAY). The firm launched a campaign with a series of ads which enumerate some so-called “rules” for a fashionable young woman. The fact that these are numbered engages the public in constructing the image of the brand in a consistent and consistent manner.

The numeral can also indicate the latest model of a technical device:

Samsung Galaxy Note 3 + Gear (Idem: 106) – the number occurs in a post-determiner position inside the noun phrase.

Figures modifying noun phrases denoting or describing technical devices add to an idea of scientific complexity and sophistication, whose sudden availability is an opportunity which should not be missed.

Further examples can be provided:

Why a 41 megapixel smartphone rocks. Meet the Nokia Lumia 1020. (Idem: 122) with eighteen diamonds on the bezel, a mother of pearl dial and 5 bar water resistance (Idem: 124)

DE watch. NEW DE collection. 10 ATM (Idem: 163)

We note that in the case of cosmetics, numbers can indicate a certain shade:

Limited edition. N°3. Vaseline (Idem: 157) – ad for lipsticks;

SandalEyes Retro Glam Mascara shade 003 Extreme Black, SandalEyes Micro Liner shade 001 Black and SandalEyes Shadow Paints shade 005 Golden Bronze. (Idem: 197) – ad for mascara.

When numerals are used in calculating the different advantages of a product, they require a demonstrative, almost epithet value:

7 specially designed benefits. 1 complete sensitivity response (Idem: 215)

Infinity Always. Absorbs 10x its weight so you barely feel it (Idem: 291)

Hundreds of thousands of girls and women around the world die every year from complications in pregnancy or childbirth, creating a rippling effect that devastates

Children, families, and communities. Ninety per cent of these deaths are preventable – with your help. (Idem: 292)

Another example can be analysed in the Landome ad for dark spot correctors, where the numeral shows symbolic value:

We know that the figure “3” has powerful symbolic and cultural associations. According to The Wordsworth Dictionary of Phrase & Fable, “Pythagoras calls three the perfect number, expressive of “beginning, middle, and end”, wherefore he makes it a symbol of Deity.” (Dobham Brewer, 1993: 1077) Consequently, we could say that the product seems to acquire almost mythical qualities.

In what follows, we have examples of numerals which refer to the year when different companies were founded. This stresses continuity and tradition in the marketplace economy, which are a proof of success, competence and quality.

ADURIST. EST. 1946 LONDON. The artistic armed collection has been perfected during our 67 years of creating high quality time pieces, inspired by the sparkle of the London winter skyline. (Idem: 116)

Celebrating 100 years of Seiko watch making (Idem: 124)

EST. 1973. Best when. Better now. (Idem: 178)

The maker of lingerie since 1886 (Idem: 182)

Great British Cider since 1887 (Idem: 231)

30 years of studying breastmilk have taught us how iron helps your baby’s brain development. (Idem: 169)

A philosophy of consumerism is superbly illustrated in the following ad for Cider, which measures and defines the product with a succession of features articulated on the axes of time (with the dimension of tradition) and space, as value for money, quality, all bound together by the human factor:

In 1899 Percy & Fred Bulmer spent £24 on a bicycle made for two. They certainly got their money’s worth when Fred cycled 500 miles in seven days in search of quality apples for their Bulmers Cider. Great British Cider since 1887. (Idem: 231)

Conclusions

Numerals are necessary if advertisers wish to qualify their offer in a precise manner: price, dimensions, percentage of substances in a product, technical specifications, the length of tradition in the manufacturing of a product, call-back surveys etc. Different persuasive means are identified across a range of examples, which illustrate, yet again, an alignment of the British advertising discourse with the country's general cultural profile; there is a tendency towards offering fact-based information in communication in what has been termed as an environment with a "Low involvement communication" orientation. The schematic structure of the text layout is often constructed around numerals, also signalling the informal register of these vocative texts. In pragmatic terms, numbers are frequently used in ads in order to entail like and implikable much, as advertisers' art of often does, relying on the public to apply conversational maxims. Numbers gain iconic value, both deriving from and consolidating a consumerist ideology in which the product is frenziedly measured, counted, sold and acquired, determined to prove that it is worth our while.

ABSTRACT

This paper attempts an analysis of Angela Carter's last two novels from the perspective of spatiality. Apart from gender inscriptions, space implies the reality of physical borders and, since space is a social construction, the borders become ideological, transgressive barriers. Considering that Carter was a subversive writer who enjoyed dismantling old patterns of thought, I will focus on the strategies that she envisaged in order to deconstruct the cultural and geographical pressure of the centre.

KEYWORDS: canon, centre, empire, language, space

The attention that postmodernism has paid to the production of space echoes an older feminist preoccupation with spatiality as a powerful tool in shaping and maintaining gender identities and relations. In the introduction to Reconfigured Spheres. Feminist Explorations of Literary Space, Margaret Higonnet discusses space in terms of symbolic gendering, arguing that certain types of physical and social space have been traditionally labelled as either feminine or masculine (5). Thus second-wave feminism militated against the structural pairs of oppositions that elegaic women to the domestic sphere of home and the inside, while men enjoy the public freedom of work and the outside. Consequently, there is a powerful link between space and patriarchal relations. As Lefebvre has demonstrated, ideology and practice — 'thought and action' (26) — produce the spaces which reinforce them; in other words, patriarchy manifests its power spatially.

Apart from gender inscriptions, space implies the reality of physical borders, of margins, and, since space is a social construction, the borders become ideological, transgressive barriers, or, as Lefebvre puts it, 'the ultimate foundation of social space is prohibition' (35). At the same time, borders read as distance from the centre, thus highlighting the 'inferiority' of peripheral existence, as well as the tension of living on the threshold. From this perspective, feminism has shared postmodernism's deconstructing impulses, which attempt to dismantle the logic of the centre. When the centre does not hold, then the margins come to the fore, demanding to be acknowledged in their own right and not as the negative double of a single, universal centre. In A Poetics of Postmodernism Linda Hutcheon argues that

The move to rethink margins and borders is clearly a move away from a centralization with its associated concepts of origin, oneness...and monumentality...that work to link the concepts of center to those of the eternal and the universal. (58)

The concern with the production of space has largely been informed by colonial and postcolonial studies, which attempt to expose the effects of European domination over space by focusing on issues of geographical marginality, migration and political displacement. The representations of these issues are more often than not anonymously juxtaposed across the categories of race and gender, and consequently they have drawn the attention of numerous women writers, feminist theorists and critics. Feminism has long since opposed the gender inscription of the border created between public and personal spaces, therefore, the famous slogan of Women's Movement— 'The personal is political' —constituted a rallying call for women writers to engage in exploring how domestic or familial relations could be viewed as political as issues of war or foreign policy. In the context of the power relations between home and colony, more recent literature, especially from postcolonial nations, has shifted the focus from private and political aspects of femininity to issues of nationalism and imperialism, in connection with gender specificity.

At this point it is perhaps useful to stress that there is a connection between the disruptive study of place and national identity. According to Benwell, national identity does not designate solely 'a psychological identification with the nation', but a product of various habits of social life that 'make up banal nationalism' (227). Benwell explains that 'nation' as a disruptively located category conjures both the social and the spatial, since it refers to people who share certain similarities, and to place as 'the imagined country or homeland' (228).

Britain's preoccupation of a firm empire has been fiercely criticized in much contemporary women's writing, for patriarchy, as Virginia Woolf showed, is closely linked to the politics of extreme nationalism, imperialism and fascism. Women, as well as new territories, are regarded as the 'admirable fabric of the masculine intelligence' (Woolf, Lighthouse 64), a sort of iron girder built in order to secure the masculine values of individuality, oneness, aggression and competition. The empire has consequently become a large form of feministic resistance. Thus the vilified London, as the hub of imperial England, becomes in Angela Carter's last two novels, Nights at the Circus and Wise Children, an epitome of masculine, 'superior' prerogatives, hence the writer's intention to subvert their centrality and their center. Both Virginia Woolf and Angela Carter engage in constructing a feminine identity that will eventually undo the masculine discourse on power. Whereas Woolf chooses to present an alternative subjectivity based on human communication and personal ties, Carter's strategy is different: she leaves her characters in the milieu of their culturally imposed femininity, but teaches them to take advantage of their position and enjoy the freedom of their very marginality. In this way Carter joins the French poststructuralist theorists, who have argued that 'the margin is the ultimate place of subversion and transgression' (Hutcheon 195). In what follows, we shall focus on the strategies that the writer envisages in order to free her women characters from the pressure of the cultural and geographical spaces ideologically assigned to them.

Sites of women's enclosure: the room, the brothel, the museum

Nights at the Circus begins in 'smoky old London' (D arker, Nights 7) where Fevvers returns triumphantly after her artistic conquests on the Continent, ready to impress her native city in the way she had impressed Europe. As a woman with wings, the heroine displays her body as a grotesque, yet fascinating, hybrid challenging the accepted parameters of 'normal' womanhood. Born together with the twentieth century, Fevvers brings the promise of a new beginning, casting herself in the utopian role of the New Woman, and making ringing declarations that on the old world has turned on its axle so shall the new dawn can dawn, then, ah, then! All the women will have wings, the same as I' (D arker, Nights 285). Nevertheless, the novel clearly shows that such a promise cannot be fulfilled in the centre of the empire, and consequently the action gradually expands in space, flying away from London together with Fevvers. As Sarah Gamble observes, Nights at the Circus is the longest novel written by D arker, yet its sense of expansiveness doesn't have so much to do with the number of pages as with the sense of space, for the narrative itself mimics Fevvers's leisurely pace through the air' (157).

The plot device of a touring circus and touring theatre stretches the narrative to remote parts of the world. The novel is divided into three parts, each related to a particular geographical location. Lucie Armistead argues that Nights at the Circus makes clear the close relationship between geographical place and imperialism (180), and seeks out to discover new territories in search for the freedom denied by the centre. London bears the mark of cultural and psychological enclosure, featuring spaces of claustrophobia, which was characteristic of D arker's earlier fiction. Thus Walser enters Fevvers in her dressing-room in the Alhambra Music Hall, a space so suffused with femininity that the man feels uncomfortable: 'The room, in all, was a masterpiece of exquisitely feminine equalors, sufficient in its homely way, to intimidate a young man who had led a less sheltered life than his one' (D arker, Nights 9). Fevvers's room, though 'her own', is thus her 'proper' sphere in contrast with the vast, 'unsheltered' territories inhabited by men. On the other hand, the fact that Walser feels intimidated by Fevvers's display of femininity is a sign of the woman's ability to turn her room into her culturally assigned space into a source of power.

The story goes on to reveal two other sites of women's enclosure: Ma Nelson's brothel, 'a wholly female world' (D arker, Nights 38), and Madame Schrock's museum of women freaks. The brothel where Fevvers grows up, suggestively built in the Age of Reason, is not a place of decadence or vice, but one of privilege and exquisite taste: 'You entered a place that like its mistress, turned a blind eye to the horrors of the outside, for, inside, was a place of privilege in which those who visited might extend the boundaries of their experience for a not unreasonable sum' (D arker, Nights 26). Prostitution is regarded as an honest way of earning a living, thus blurring the distinction between 'good' and 'bad' women. During the working hours, the girls engage in selling the simulators of pleasure, urged by economic necessity. In the absence of male clients, Ma Nelson's academy looks like a 'well-ordered habitation' in which the girls keep to their rooms, following their own intellectual or artistic pursuits. Thus the brothel features a not exclusively feminine world, governed by mutual understanding and commitment.

It was a wholly female world within Ma Nelson's door. Even the dog who guarded it was a bitch and all the cats were females, one or the other of 'em always in kitchen, or newly given birth, so the constant sub-attack of fertility underwrote the gliding sensuality of the pleasure of the flesh available within the academy. Life within those walls was governed by a sweet and loving reason. I never saw a single blow exchanged between any of the sisterhood who reared me, nor heard a cross word or a voice raised in anger.

(Vander, Nights 39)

After Ma Nelson's death, the place is inherited by a man who symbolically cleans the house in order to transform it into a 'hostel for fallen girls' (Vander, Nights 44). The Judgment Day of society's intrusion steals the girls away, but their friendship, we are told, continues to unite them for 'invisible bonds of affection would always knit us wherever we roamed' (Vander, Nights 45).

Madame Schreck's museum of human deformities and anomalies, Fevvers's next destination, appears as the dark counterpart of Ma Nelson's brothel, the place catering 'for those who were troubled in their...souls' (Vander, Nights 57). Madame Schreck organises her museum much like Dante's inferno, on circles of 'sin' where she descends 'like Virgil in Hell, whether like Dante or not' (Vander, Nights 62). The fine gentlemen who visit the place do not pay for the pleasure of the flesh, but for the permission to gaze and poke at the exhibits: the Sleeping Beauty, the Wonder who never grows, Fanny who had eyes instead of nipples, or Fevvers the winged-lady. The 'unnatural' is displayed in order to enforce the visitors' belief in their own 'naturalness', when in fact they 'were the unnatural ones' (Vander, Nights 61). Sarah Gamble points out that throughout the novel, 'the freakish are made the recipients of the "normal" world's fears and perversions' (160) and, not surprisingly, the female bodies become the perfect mirrors.

Fevvers and the other female slaves build their friendship on the common basis of their marginal social status and the painful awareness that they are forever abandoned by the conventions of a patriarchal culture unwilling to tolerate unnaturalness. The physical deformities are perceived as metaphorical 'challenges and interruptions to the conventional narrative of femininity' (Hanson 63). Therefore, Vander presents the female community in the museum as a bitter parody of the patriarchal approach to womanhood.

The fantastic of far away places

After Fevvers signs a contract for a Grand Imperial Tour, the action moves from London to Imperial Russia, and from here to the tabula rasa of Siberia, in a geographical displacement of the centre meant to challenge the limits of the British Empire. This movement towards foreign places parallels a movement away from reality and towards an increasing fantasy. In The Poetics of Space, Gaston Bachelard comments on the relation between domestic interiors and fantasies, finding, like Virginia Woolf, that the home space 'is unwilling to remain permanently enclosed. It deploys and appears to move elsewhere without difficulty; in other times, and on different planes of dream and memory' (53). By encouraging daydreaming, the house loses its confining dimensions of domestic confinement and opens the space to imaginary journeys.

In this light, the fantasy begins to be evident in Nights at the Circus from the very beginning, manifesting its disquieting presence in the everyday realm of home and London, when Lizzie plays tricks with Big Ben and Father Time (Armitage 182). The notion of time is itself related to the power of the Centre. Time means Greenwich, a small borough of greater London, from where international temporal measures are dictated. Discussing the implications of Greenwich prime meridian, Indira Karamchevicquas time with a 'theatrical figure' no longer attached to a physical universe, but 'assuming symbolic power to control our knowledge of the world' (126). By virtue of Lizzie's tricks, Warner manages to subvert the ideological operation of central time, and thus of the entire notion of patriarchal centre, since the tricks appear as a conspiracy between women:

At the sparkling doorway of the House, the girl's hands of Big Ben pointed to five minutes to seven. Both women looked up at the clock face and smiled a single, small smile of complicity of which Walser received the faded aftermath as she turned to shake his hand. A strong, firm, masculine grip. No gloves.

(Warner, Nights 89)

Faced with Big Ben's apparently to keep striking twelve o'clock, as well as with Fevvers's earthly physicality, Walser begins to doubt his reasoning 'apart from' 'Shall I believe in it? Shall I pretend to believe in it?' (Warner, Nights 28). Like the narrative itself, Walser is losing the stable grounds of reality.

Away from the ruling Centre which is London, and away from 'reality', Warner presents a primitive utopia of a female community. In a far fetched place in Siberia, Douness P., who had once murdered her husband by meticulous poisoning over a period of years, set up a private asylum for female criminals. In perfect silence, women are exposed to a therapy of meditation; they 'would live alone with the memory of their crime until they acknowledged no guilt...but their responsibility' (Warner, Nights 212) for killing their husbands. Communication is strictly forbidden between inmates, as well as between inmates and wardresses, all equally imprisoned and constantly watched. In spite of prohibitions, the communication between women is established in the most unconventional yet utterly feminine manner when Olga Alexandrovna starts writing notes to a wardress in menstrual blood, 'conventionally seen as dirty and a demarcation between men and women' (Peath 135). The female bond thus created is all the more powerful since it enables women's solidarity beyond the confines of the Symbolic. As Dioxus famously proclaims:

This is writing, from woman and toward woman, and in accepting the challenge of the discourse controlled by the phallus, the woman will affirm woman somewhere other than in silence, the place reserved for her in and through the Symbolic. (93)

At the same time, the writing in the womb's blood registers a woman's most authentic way of expressing herself, that is, the writing of and through the body.

‘Write yourself’, advises Dixous, ‘your body must make itself heard. Then the huge resources of the unconscious will burst upon finally the inexhaustible feminine Imaginary is going to be deployed’ (97). Writing becomes synonymous with a subversive act as women break up their long imposed silence and openly assert an uncensored relationship with their own sexuality. To write is to return to women the body from which they have turned away.

Woman must write her body, must make up the unimpeded tongue that bursts paragraphs, classes, and rhythms, orders and codes, must nudge, run through, go beyond the discourse with its reserves, including the one of laughing off the word “silence” that has to be said, the one that aiming for the impossible, stops dead before the word “impossible” and writes it as “end”.

(Dixous & Lémen 94–95)

This ‘army of lovers’ (Dixous, Nights 217) finally rise against the head of the establishment and go out into the white world which looked like ‘a blank sheet of fresh paper’ (Dixous, Nights 218) on which they are free to inscribe whatever words or designs they may choose. Yet no words are uttered; kisses and embraces are exchanged and the infinite joy bursts open in singing. For Dixous, the song represents ‘the first music of the voice of love, which every woman keeps alive... Within each woman the first nameless love is singing’ (93).

In Revolution in Poetic Language, Julia Kristeva regards music as one of the ‘non-verbal signifying systems that are constructed exclusively on the basis of the semiotic’ (24). The joy and physical sensations to be found in music originate in baby language, and are therefore associated with the mother tongue. In Dixous’s Nights at the Circus, the women escaping the asylum reclaim then, in their songs, their mother tongues or, in Dixous’s terms, ‘the lost mother/bi-der-lost’ (93).

Such utopian female societies, as the one presented by Dixous, function as a ‘counter society’ which, according to Kristeva, constitutes ‘a sort of alter-ego of the official society, in which all real or fantasized possibilities for jouissance take refuge’ (Women 870). In Dixous’s novel, this place outside the law is inhabited by women who are marginalised either as women and then as criminals. Their very marginality is turned into a refuge, into jouissance which is always a transgression, a space where female desires and body rhythms can be freely displayed.

The novel’s movement away from Britain may also stand for an implicit rejection of ‘nation’, for a form of exile, displacement or homelessness. Evvers abandons the imprisonment of the claustrophobic places allotted to women, and seeks a geography of vast spaces, in a utopian place and time before the empire and male colonialism drew a line between the margin and the centre. As Virginia Woolf claimed in Three Guineas: ‘As a woman I have no country; as a woman I want no country; as a woman my country is the whole world’ (109).

The fall of the British Empire

Wise Children, like Nights at the Circus, is located in London, but the London of a Britain caught in a historical period of post-imperial decline. Dora handles observes: 'in these days, there is no such thing as a penny any more and it is as if this foggy three-cornered island were dangling from a cloud – now we are in the air' (Carter, Children 112). As a personal witness of almost an entire century, Dora can recognise a number of indicators of Britain's decline, such as the disappearance of the Lyons cashops, a long with differences for the changes in London's geography: 'Even the railway stations changed out of recognition, turned into souks. Waterloo. Victoria. Nowhere you can get a decent cup of tea, all they give you is Harvey Wallbangers, filthy cappuccino' (Carter, Children 3). Nonetheless, these apparently minor changes refer to tea as a symbol of British traditional customs, tastes and lifestyles, pointing, thus, to larger socio-cultural changes.

The most striking image of the decline of the British Empire in Wise Children is embodied by Gorgeous George, a parody of the English patron saint since the Empire is the product of male desire to conquer and subvert others, it is through a male body that its subsequent fall is represented. Gorgeous George is a totemic figure who has the map of the world tattooed on his body. While singing Rose of England, God Save the King and Rule, Britannia he strips off to reveal his underwear 'made out of the union Jack' as well as 'the shape of Good Hope situated in his navel and... the Falkland Islands... down the crack of his bum' (Carter, Children 67). The tattooed map representing the geography of the empire is bright pink, reminding those days when 'there was so much pink on the map of the world that English was spoken everywhere' (Carter, Children 17). In limelight the pink turns into 'a morbid raspberry colour that looked bad for his health' (Carter, Children 67), suggesting how the empire has proved utterly unhealthy not only for the colonised people, but also for the British themselves.

At the sight of George's body, the children Dora and Nora are bemused, since they had been taught that men were supposed to win battles and rule the world: 'Hah! Grandma told us that wars were a way to get the young men out of the picture, leave all the women for the ugly old codgers who wouldn't have got any, otherwise?' (Carter, Children 67). The time of won battles is over and Gorgeous George merely stands for 'the idea of conquest. He is a walking metaphor, effective mirror-image. George shows us an empire falling: having once dominated the world, this Englishman can now be master of only one space: his own body' (Webb 197). Or, as Dora mentions in her autobiography, 'George was not a comic at all but an enormous sad man' (Carter, Children 66) of the decline of an empire.

The novel draws a parallel between the rise and fall of the empire and the English theatre, whose main representative figures in the story are the Hazards. The House of Hazards flourished as a theatrical family during the glorious days of British imperialism, when Shakespeare used to be the symbol of cultural excellence and British patriotism. Just as Sepimus in Woolf's Mrs. Dalloway volunteered 'to save an England which consisted almost entirely of Shakespeare's Plays' (75), the characters' paternal grandparents, Ranulph and Esella Hazard, embark on a mission to take the civilising word of Shakespeare 'to the end of the Empire' (Carter, Children 17), where Shakespeare had never been before. Ranulph, and later Melchior, both take on the attributes of the Shakespearean roles they play and the extent to which their life merges with fiction: 'Old Ranulph couldn't tell the difference between Shakespeare and living' (Dorner, Children 21). They dominated the British theatre in the same patriarchal manner in which they patronise their amazingly complicated family.

However, as Dora mentions from the beginning, 'you can't trust things to stay the same' (Dorner, Children 1). The DHantes witness how both the empire and the theatre are crumbling and suddenly getting globalised. As the twentieth century gets underway, theatre is gradually upstaged by the new ascendant media of film and television. Thus A Midsummer Night's Dream is made into a 1930s Hollywood film, which is later perceived as 'a masterpiece of kitsch' (Dorner, Children 111), pointing to the inevitable downfall of 'high' art, the Hazards and the British Empire altogether. Just as the new ascendant media of film and television displace Shakespeare on stage, the Hazards are compromising their theatrical reputation in magazine advertisements: 'To buckle or not to buckle...' (Dorner, Children 38). Sarah Gamble argues that Dorner attempts to reveal 'the process by which objects of cultural value lose their ability to participate within a dominant aesthetic. In this way, theatrical institutions, once enshrined in high culture, become appropriable by contemporary popular cultural forms' (178).

On the other hand, Gerardine Meaney pinpoints that the dismissal of Shakespeare and the Hazard family as two emblematic figures of imperial and patriarchal domination begins in North America, which appears as the only colony in Wise Children, 'partly because it has suspended the power of the "parent country and inverted the relation of centre to margin' (129). Moreover, since the new World is a colony, it has been gendered as feminine, as the Other of the masculine centre; hence the order and stability of the British Empire are challenged on feminine grounds. It is in America that Ranulph began to mix internal and external fantasy to the extent that during a representation of Othello, he identified with the hero and killed his wife, her lover and himself. It is in America as well that Dora realises that their routine work at Hollywood turned all of them into both slaves and market commodities:

We worked like slaves. Take after take after take. The same routine, the same song, the same line – over and over and over. We were both producer and process, simultaneously, and every near broke us. And what did all our hard work add up to? Just another Saturday night at the pictures! Your one shilling and ninepenn'orth. Your helping of dark. What an equation. Our sweated labour ≠ your bit of fun.
"Like rats", said Nora, with grim disasle.

(Dorner, Children 142)

The commodity trend that gives prominence to the cinema also places Shakespeare on a banknote, ironically turning the symbol of British high culture 'into a cultural currency' (Dorner, Children 191).

Lorna Sage brings a useful clarification by showing that Dorner's presentation of Shakespeare's fate in postcolonial Britain is by no means a disrespectful upturning of the bard's plays, but rather an attempt to 'disseminate Shakespeare, spread him around, reinvent him as later day demagogue' (56). Shakespeare may well represent the literary canon much contested by feminists, but Dorner manages to 'rescue' him by integrating his work into popular culture. Sage offers an interesting quotation, from one of her interviews with Dorner, in which the novelist announced:

Shakespeare just isn't an intellectual... intellectuals... are still reluctant to read him as popular culture... You mention folk culture and people immediately assume you're going to talk about porridge and dog dancing... Shakespeare, like Pina so, is one of the great hinge-figures that sum up the past— one of the great Janus-figures that sum up the past as well as opening all the doors towards the future... (56)

Finally, another strategy of distancing from the centre that Carter envisages is to be found in the de-centrality of culture. The writer joins postmodernist theorists and artists in debunking the high/low aesthetic hierarchy of earlier times by challenging cultural specificity, the canon and conventional methods of analysis. From a feminist perspective, the literary canon does not make up a corpus of universal values, but rather aesthetically responds to what socially wants politically. At the same time, it is the literature that has offered women the space from which to voice their political, emancipative ideas. Therefore, since the mid-1970s feminist criticism has actively engaged in assaulting the fixed limits of the literary canon, a gesture which is best illustrated in contemporary feminine fiction, which has embraced 'non-canonical' forms of literature. As Patricia Waugh observes:

many contemporary women writers have sought to "displace" their desires, seeking articulation not through the rational and anonymous structures of realism but through the associative and metaphorical modes of fantasy: romantic, science fiction, gothic, utopia, horror. (171)

It is precisely what Carter does with her fiction which consciously mingles fact with fantasy, real figures with gothic characters, and conventional spaces with utopian worlds.

On the other hand, literature and its medium of representation, that is language, constitute a major factor in the reproduction of patriarchy. The condition of patriarchy and the very concept of margin presuppose the reality of isolation and an implied exclusion from the system of symbolic language. In moving between received languages and undervalued ways of speaking, such as music, Carter managed to create a certain poetics of displacement, which stresses the necessity of transgressing borders. Thus her literary work engages in a crossing of margins and literary genres in order to overcome cultural marginality.

Conclusion

In Angela Carter's novels, the category of gender is often juxtaposed across the issues of cultural, psychological and geographical marginality. In order to fracture the patriarchal discourse of power and enable women to find their space and tell their stories, the writer relies on the fantasy which functions in her novels as both a successful postmodern strategy of questioning mimetic representation and a source of political, utopian transgression. Writing from the margins of culture and the literary canon, Carter places great emphasis on dismantling the logics of the centre by valorising the empowering potential of women's peripheral existence and experience. Her ultimate incursions in transgressing borders is a rethinking of feminine identity. From

This perspective, he explains discussed in his article figure various strategies for asserting women's subjectivity on terms other than the negative of positive masculine values.

Adam's apple – a grape of the vine?

ABSTRACT

“And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat.” (Genesis, 3:6) And indeed they died, not as gods, as the serpents said, but as mere mortals, acknowledging the fact that they were lied to and pushed into disobedience, tasting the evil and the bitterness of being separated from the Creator. “The forbidden fruit is identified respectively with the fig, grape, apple of paradise (Erog), wheat (which grew on the stalks as tall as the cedars of Lebanon) and the nut” (Ginzberg, 1998: 97). The kind of fruit in itself is not of capital importance as the transgressing of God's word but the possible exciting, drugging effects on the first pair in paradise are obvious. Just as in Noah's case, the juice from the grape to consumption might have been responsible for euphoric state of the Adam – Eve pair, the lush of the fruit during behaviour.

KEYWORDS: fruit, tree of knowledge of good and evil, wine, vine, blood, apple

“And out of the ground made the LORD God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil.” (Genesis, 2:9) And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat (Genesis, 2:16). “But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.” (Genesis, 2:17)

Out of the acknowledgment of sins comes a far greater understanding or knowledge of good and evil, as this knowledge was prior to fall, because God created an intelligent Adam, who was the possessor of an inventive mind, himself being able to name the entire creation, as we know it today. It is quite comprehensible that God would create a man according to His resemblance and figure, “in his own image” (Genesis, 2:27) because “...we are not able to conceive of anything in God the likeness of which we do not find in ourselves.” (Millvaine, 1847: 41). So, he is a man with free will, not a machinery, a freedom to choose the good – The Creator or the evil – the disobedience of God's word, a man able to understand hidden things, as he was sleeping-like the creation of Eve: “...bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man” (Genesis, 2:23). He, therefore, is a complete individual, the first flesh icon recorded, God's mirror, who has the sensitivity to understand the importance of the wedding, the union with Eve, whose name he chooses. So, Adam, perfectly acknowledges good and evil – although he has no yet felt the harshness of it in the absence of God – before “tasting” the fruit of his day.

Nowhere in the Bible does it say the kind of fruit the “eat”, or whether this eating/trespassing of God’s commandment is a kind of sexual lust after the eyes were “opened”. Adam has a double responsibility, towards keeping God’s demand and towards Eve, whom she was given to hold, because he is a co-creator himself, since he, somehow, created Eve, so he falls twice, and the Serpent knows that the perfect, free, yet uncorrupted individual, with the strongest attributes and free will, a son of God, not a slave, falls into defeat by choosing to eat from the tree of knowledge of good and evil, having knowledge already, though not feeling it. The fruit of his day handed by his beloved Eve has not been specified in the Bible, and the probability is rather overwhelming, as the Garden of Eden encompassed the creation and imagination of God, the father, the Unity in Trinity.

The forbidden fruit is identified respectively with the fig, grape, apple of paradise (Erog), wheat (which grew on the stalks as tall as the cedars of Lebanon) and the nut.” (Ginzberg, 1998: 97). Imagining that everything in the Garden of Eden was blown out of proportions, it is only logical to presume that a single grape could be as big as an apple and its fermenting juice as strong as a wine, an euphoric drug.

“And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat” (Genesis, 3:6). The desire incited by the old Serpent, the first rebel to fall from the Heavens, together with the euphoric juice in the fruit somehow made it possible for the first pair to forget God’s words, to suffer an extent so to renounce everything tangible as the Paradise, their home, their holiness in order to be as God. But they were as God, although of earthly, dusty flesh. The desire for other than innocent wisdom – whom they already possessed, raises questions; they were already co-creators, rulers of Paradise, living in absolute bliss, but they had not yet passed temptation, the bending of human spirit to the absolute will of God, the greatest power of free will, is the renouncement of it, the turning of free will, just as David and Job did, and monks do, nowadays.

“But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it; neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die.” (Genesis, 3:3) And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die: (Genesis, 3:4) For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil. (Genesis, 3:5) But they already knew good and evil, otherwise how could they acknowledge, comprehend what God commended them, asks himself Saint Joan Golden Mouth. It was God that allowed Satan to tempt his creation, in the first place, as He did with Job and David, this being a usual manner in order to become worthy of being the son of God; the wish of Lucifer to be as the Most High “I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High.” (Isaiah, 14:14) was the thing that brought his punishment and fall he now wants to reproduce on the Adam and Eve, out of jealousy, because he knows

God created them to fill the empty space he and his angels left after the disobedience and fall into the pit.

The kind of fruit in itself is not of a capital importance – “The tree of knowledge of good and evil; that is, the experience of good and evil by event” (apud Raleigh, 1829: 136) – as the trespassing of God’s word but is possible exciting, drugging effects on the first pair in paradise are obvious. Just as in Noah’s case, the juice from the grape consumption might have been responsible for euphoric state of the Adam – Eve pair, the lush of the fruit altering behaviour. The possibility of the fruit to be the grape is explainable throughout the bible, as the wine becomes the first miracle at the wedding in the Cana of Galilee and the holy blood of Christ as God Himself says in the Last Supper, thus the symbolism flows from the beginning of the human race up to the gates of Heavens, where Christ awaits his disciples to drink from the fruit of the wine, again.

The possibility that the fruit of knowledge of good and evil be a lush, fermented grape seems possible, as under this euphoric state, Adam lets himself be fooled by Eve, not to doubt it as God said, but to eat it and loses his senses, becoming corrupt ultimately repeating Lucifer’s fall and rebellion. Yet his pride prevents him from asking forgiveness from God, Adam being the first interrogated by the Lord:

“And the LORD God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou?” (Genesis, 3:9) Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat? (Genesis, 3:11) And the man said, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. (Genesis, 3:12, 13) – had he recognised his fault had Eve asked for pardon surely God would have considered to forgive them, but in the absence of repentance God took caution measures and cast them out of Paradise “...ejectus Adam de Paradiso voluptatis, exilium vitae temporalis intravit...” (Parker, 1833: 2), lest they should eat from the tree of life and live forever, in absence of recognition of their sin.

This fruit Adam and Eve ate – “For some have conceived it a vine; in the mystery of whose fruit lay the expiation of the transgression” (Browne, 1835: 295) is the grape of lack of faith in God’s word, the perfect demonstration that the Lord created not a machinery to afford to the master, but a free individual, a god in God’s own image, with power over the creation, with dominion, love and equally freedom being the entire purpose of creation. The logical correlation between the expiation of transgressions and the fruit in Eden seems logical, since the first three chapters lay down the unfolding of future events – the revelation of God’s intentions to save the man He has so loved, and the first mention of Virgin Mary, Mother of God and the crucifixion of Jesus Christ – “And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.” (Genesis, 3:15).

It would only make sense if that God would reinsure this tree and the fruit if it bears for in Christ we receive more than we have lost through Adam, and coincidentally or not, the first miracle Christ performs is the turning of water into wine, the sacrifice of His Holy blood He would execute. The fruit of the vine, the grape, must have had enhancing, lushful properties since Adam and Eve were not the only one fooled by it, but also righteous Noah, and the vine being the first tree to be planted after the flood, there is this reiteration of the red, lushful fruit and the attemp to expiate it somehow.

The vine brings Noah disgrace, too:

And Noah began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard: And he drank of the wine, and was drunken; and he was uncovered within his tent. And Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren without. And Shem and Japheth took a garment, and laid it upon both their shoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father; and their faces were backward, and they saw not their father's nakedness. And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him. And he said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren.

(Genesis, 9:20, ...25)

To see thy father nakedness means to have abusive, sexual intercourse with his father's wife, his own mother, "The nakedness of thy father's wife shalt thou not uncover: it is thy father's nakedness" (Leviticus, 18:8) because Noah was already uncovered in his sin and uncovered is "...literally "uncovering the nakedness" ≠ incest or unchastity" (Ginzberg, 1998: 193), as we can see from the written laws and regulations in the Talmud: "Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy daughter in law. She is thy son's wife; thou shalt not uncover thy nakedness." or "the nakedness of thy father's wife thou shalt not uncover- this verse in Jeridim her after his father's death. (Ibidem: 316)

So the already fallen nature of man combined with the exhilarating effects of grape of the vine have proven again to be a disaster, this time, without external, satanic influence, thus, sleeping with his mother, Ham practically emasculates his father, ensuring prevalence over the bloodline, as a patriarch, knowing his father would never touch the stained woman. Both Noah and Ham repeat Adam's sin in the Garden of Eden, under the intoxication of the grape, Noah by not keeping vigilance unto his family and Ham by trying to take the place of his Father. No matter the reasons, the evil finds somehow a gate and prevails in the new men, the new Adams, of the post-flooded Earth, thus causing Noah's curse over the Canaanites.

Of course one cannot put the blame on the grape, man is the perpetrator, but the possible intoxicating effects of the grape would add to such disasters, that later God will repair, in his own blood. In fact, of thorns and "...his feet shall bring forth to thee;" (Genesis, 3:18) God testifies Adam and prophesies the upcoming of The Saviour, as whomever man God might decide to choose "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" (Isaiah, 6:8) will not be capable of listen to His holy word entirely.

So God's plan to redeem the fallen human nature would presumably include the redemption of the mottled fruit during it in his Holy Blood, the Eucharist and the Communion, by which we are all saved. It seems a logical correlation since we take the wine and bread symbolizing the shed blood and body of Christ in Holy Communion as a remembrance of his sacrifice, thus God, coming fourth in the world Himself, renews the wine, transforming it into his Blood in the Last Supper:

And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it: For this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until the day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.

(Matthew, 22:28, 29)

It could be a clear reminder of the invigorating fruit of Paradise had caused problem to the first pair and sealed their faith, either by even or not, it is with certainty that we take the Holy Eucharist as wine not as apple, simply considering God's many textual prophesies in Genesis chapter three.

ABSTRACT: The game and the clash of languages in Les Naufragés de l'intelligence by Jean-Marie Adiaffi Adé: a new glottophagy?

Les Naufragés de l'intelligence by Jean-Marie Adiaffi Adé is a hybrid writing because mixing French and Ivorian idioms. In fact, this novel appropriates the colonization language by adding massively, not only some names of characters and spaces, but also some words and expressions peculiar to diverse Ivorian idioms. It transforms French using Nouchi, a half-French language that impressively mixes French and Ivorian idioms. Though these structural processes, Adiaffi's novel instead of being part of a language death process is rather inserted in a language levelling ideology, so militating in favour of a dialogue of languages with a view to achieving the advent of an intermediate language that should work on a world to be emergent.

Introduction

Bien que figurant parmi les notions les plus employées dans les discours en sciences du langage, le concept de langue alimente aujourd'hui encore de vives polémiques. Les linguistes hésitent à lui conférer une définition scientifique consensuelle (Hendry, 2002 : 5). Si, pour certains, les gens "civilisés" parlent des langues alors que les "sauvages" ont des dialectes, des patois ou des parlers mal dégrossis (Lévy, 1974 : 40-54), la définition qui semble cependant la moins marquée par un subjectivisme répondant à celle de Jean Fourquet. Pour lui, « il semble scientifiquement préférable de donner le nom de langue à l'ensemble organisé de moyens de communication par la parole » (Fourquet, 1969 : 581). À ce titre, tout système de signes arbitraires, mais cohésif, propre à une communauté ou à une nation qui permet de communiquer doit être pris comme une langue. Pour contourner ce dilemme, quelques linguistes préfèrent utiliser le terme d'idiome.

Avec la colonisation de l'Afrique, l'on se situe encore dans la hiérarchisation des idiomes qui confère à la langue du colonisateur le statut de langue seule susceptible d'être qualifiée comme telle, servant de véhicule de communication dans les colonies. Les idiomes africains sont alors ravalés au rang de dialectes ou de patois de sorte que les Africains en éprouvaient un malaise dans les espaces publiés, et parfois même, dans des espaces privés comme la famille. On aboutit à ce que le linguiste français Louis-Jean Alve (1974 : 14) désigne sous l'appellation de « glottophagie (...), c'est-à-dire le dévorement des langues africaines [langues des colonisés] par la langue française [celle du colonisateur] ».

Les indépendances une fois acquises, les écrivains africains qui semblent aiguillonnés par une consécration nouvelle emploient à profusion, dans leurs œuvres, des lexies des langues africaines. Des le cas de l'écrivain ivoirien Jean-Marie Adiaffi Adédon le roman, Les Naufragés de l'intelligence, multiplie les termes et expressions provenant des langues ivoiriennes ; ce qui fait dire à Béatrice Rangira Gallimore (1996 : 105) qu'« Adiaffi adopte la néoglottophagie », puisque la langue du colonisateur, le français, semble, à son tour, dévorée par celles des ex-colonisés. Peut-on affirmer, par cette posture scripturale, qu'Adiaffi ne se situe que dans une simple dynamique de néoglottophagie ? Ne s'inscrit-il que dans une logique diglossique de phagocytose du français ? Ou milite-t-il plutôt pour un dialogue des langues, prodrome d'un interlinguistique qui invite à une sorte de détournement linguistique ?

À travers une analyse socio-sémiotique, l'on mettra en évidence le mécanisme d'encodage lexical des langues ivoiriennes et sa portée idéologique. L'étude montrera ainsi, d'une part, les pratiques discursives et les stratégies d'insertion de ces langues dans le roman d'Adiaffi et elle cherchera, d'autre part, à dévoiler comment Adiaffi en fait, par ce fait, dans une idéologie de nivellement des langues qui travaillera à l'émergence d'une langue-monde.

1. Pratiques discursives et stratégies d'insertion des langues ivoiriennes

La littérature africaine se présente, à ses débuts, comme une littérature d'adhésion aux thèmes colonialistes. Dans toutes les œuvres narratives, le Noir ne se définit que par rapport au Blanc, "son maître". Le roman relevant de cette thématique est plus particulièrement marqué par l'influence de la littérature française, sur tout au niveau de l'expression, car la création romanesque de l'époque consiste en un exercice de style. Le roman africain entend montrer au lecteur européen les prouesses dont il est capable dans le maniement de la langue française. Georges Hardy écrit à ce propos au sujet de Doguiçimi de Paul Hazoumé (1938 : 5) :

« ... c'est pour la France bien entendu un singulier mérite que d'avoir au lendemain même de son installation opéré de telles conquêtes intellectuelles et morales. Le cas de Paul Hazoumé... est seulement le plus brillant de toute une série... Si son génie n'avait révélé son origine vous le prendriez pour un Français de France ; tout dans son allure urbaine, dans ses gestes aisés et mesurés, dans l'aimable ardeur qui émane de sa personne est des hommes de chez nous.

Après les deux Guerres cependant les Africains en général, et les romanciers africains en particulier, réalisent que la colonisation est plus le temps de la négation de l'homme noir, le temps de la frustration permanente et également le temps de l'ancrage des valeurs traditionnelles africaines. Un nouvel élan d'espérance trouve un écho favorable dans la thématique des romans africains et surtout dans le style des romans français. Il ne considère pas la langue française non plus comme une norme rigide à laquelle il faut se plier, mais plutôt comme une réserve de matériaux transformables par l'écriture, et même fécondables par les langues africaines. Les Naufragés de l'intelligence s'approprie, dans cette veine, la langue française à travers un encodage onomastique à ascendance ivoiriste¹ et des intrusions lexicales des langues ivoiriennes qui aliènent la langue naturelle du roman africain d'expression française.

1.1. Un encodage onomastique à ascendant ivoiriste

Se fondant sur l'étude des noms propres, l'onomatologie apparaît comme une branche à part de la linguistique. Les noms propres fondent la parité, de fait du patrimoine linguistique de chaque peuple, au même titre que les noms communs et autres mots du vocabulaire. Dans un texte littéraire, ils indiquent explicitement ou implicitement des nuances d'ordre non seulement grammatical, mais historique et surtout culturel.

La quasi-absence des anthroponymes et des toponymes repérables dans le texte d'Adiaffi prouvé, en effet, de différences langues de la Côte d'Ivoire. À ce jeu, l'agni (langue parlée à l'Est et au Sud-Est de la Côte d'Ivoire, et par ailleurs langue de l'auteur) est la mieux représentée. Pour ce qui est des personnages qui participent au roman, plus que de simples dénominations, leurs appellations s'inscrivent dans de véritables programmes narratifs. Elles font ainsi référence soit à des qualificatifs moraux ou physiques, soit à des situations vécues ou souhaitées par les personnages qui les portent soit en référence à des rites ou à des croyances populaires ivoiriennes.

Au nombre des qualificatifs moraux ou physiques, il y a des noms agni comme N'Da Tê, N'Da Kpa, Baïman Kpangni. N'Da Tê et N'Da Kpa sont des jumeaux. N'Da signifie « jumeau ». Conformément aux réquisits du mythe agni sur les jumeaux, ces deux personnages sont diamétralement opposés. N'Da Tê se présente comme le jumeau malfaisant, d'où le qualificatif Tê qui veut dire « mauvais », alors que N'Da Kpa (Kpa signifiant « bon ») est un jumeau bienfaiteur. Baïman Kpangny est une expression qui pourrait se traduire dans un français ivoirisé par « petit vieux », c'est-à-dire « un enfant qui a l'allure d'un vieillard ». Malgré son jeune âge, ce personnage vit à la Rue Princesse, la rue de tous les orgies. Il est ainsi confronté à la drogue, à la prostitution, à la criminalité...

Hormis ces noms qui décrivent le physique ou les attitudes des personnages, d'autres présentent des situations vécues ou souhaitées par des personnages. Des anthroponymes sont numériquement les plus importants : Guégon, Namala, Mo Ehian, Mihou, Yako, Manouan, Naka, B layalè, Sounan A huéliè, Missoro Sounan, Ebrô Ehomini, Missoro Ehoué Nan Mindè, Akundan N'Guéré Anaorè, Akoua Mando Sounan, Mo Gnamien Bla. Excepté Guégon et Namala, tous les autres appellations relèvent de la sphère linguistique agni.

L'un des personnages importants de l'œuvre, Guégon, tire son nom de la langue dan (langue de l'Ouest de la Côte d'Ivoire). Guégon signifie « masque mâle ». Il est le peuple dan, il occupe le sommet de la hiérarchie des masques. Dans Les Naufragés de l'intelligence, Guégon est le commissaire intégral qui permet au peuple de triompher des bahifoué (« forces du mal », « forces des ténèbres » en agni). Mis à mal par les dignitaires corrompus du régime, il est réhabilité et nommé Ministre de l'Intérieur. Le commissaire Namala donne son nom à un adjectif qualificatif malinké (langue du Nord et du Nord-Ouest de la Côte d'Ivoire) se rapportant à ce qui n'inspire pas confiance, ce qui paraît louche, fait partie des personnages qui font varier Guégon. Namala est en effet le commissaire qui collabore avec les malfaiteurs au grand dam de la population.

Pour ce qui est des noms agni, plutôt que d'en faire un traitement exhaustif, la présente étude ne s'attachera que sur les plus expressifs comme Mo Ehian, Mihou, Yako, Akoua Mando Sounan. Mo Ehian, la mère des jumeaux N'Da Tê et N'Da Kpa, vit dans le dénuement total dans un quartier précaire de la ville ; d'où son nom qui signifie « maman misère ». Quant à Mihou, son nom rappelle assurément la mort violente de son ami et collègue, l'abbé Yako. Mihou, c'est-à-dire « la douleur me tue » ou plus exactement « je me meurs » révèle, de fait, la grande souffrance morale de ce personnage. Le nom porté par son collègue Yako, prêtre-aumônier des pauvres et des morts que N'Da Tê assassine lâchement, est l'expression agni qui traduit la compassion que l'on éprouve pour quelqu'un qui vit un malheur. Quant à Akoua Mando Sounan, la prophétesse, son nom est l'un des programmes. Il signifie « je n'ai pas trouvé un homme humain ». Elle est une envoyée de Gnamien (Dieu en agni) pour rendre le monde un peu plus humain. Elle subit pour cette raison, une initiation à la montagne sacrée.

Hormis les personnages ci-dessus évoqués, il y en a donc des noms ressortissants aux rites et croyances de certains peuples ivoiriens, à savoir Ehibilé Angaman, Bahifoué, Zogbeu et Bahoron. Ehibilé Angaman, le serpent de la prêtresse Akoua Mando Sounan, est le génie des génies. L'on est obligé de le consulter avant de s'engager dans une quelconque entreprise sérieuse. Son nom qui se traduit par « serpent noir qu'il ne faut pas provoquer » sous-entend la preuve qu'on ne le consulte pas pour de banales affaires. Dans le registre des croyances populaires, se trouve aussi Bahifoué, nom renvoyant à une croyance animiste et représentant ensemble des forces maléfiques. Dans Les Naufragés de l'intelligence, Bahifoué est un personnage maléfique aux aspects odieux. Il fait en effet partie de la brigade de voleurs de N'Da Tê, le jumeau malfaisant.

Les Naufragés de l'intelligence mentionne également en scène les personnages de Zogbeu et de Bahoron. Chez les Dan, "Zo" signifie « féticheur-détecteur de sorciers ». C'est l'équivalent des "komian" chez les Agni. Le terme "Gbeu" signifie « fils ». Zogbeu est assurément le fils d'un féticheur-détecteur de sorciers. "Zo" renvoie aussi au mot français « cœur » ; "Gbeu" sera alors issu de la déformation de "Gbi", c'est-à-dire « dur ». Zogbeu signifiera alors « cœur dur » ou mieux « qui supporte beaucoup de choses », puisque son oncle, Guégon, est soumis à de rudes épreuves dans l'exercice de sa profession. Pour ce qui est de Bahoron, l'officier de police, son nom s'inscrit dans un des rites populaires du peuple béte (peuple du Centre-Ouest de la Côte d'Ivoire). Ce terme s'applique dans la région bête à la plus belle femme issue d'un concours de beauté organisé à cette effet. Par son nom, l'on peut certifier que l'officier de police Bahoron est une femme d'une beauté féérique.

Les anthroponymes que l'on retrouve dans Les Naufragés de l'intelligence prennent leur origine dans les langues et cultures ivoiriennes. Des noms empruntés aux diverses langues ivoiriennes les éléments qui entrent dans leur composition demeurent pour cette raison, sémantiquement ivoiriens. Il en est de même pour les nombreux toponymes repérables dans le roman.

Comme l'a fort bien fait remarquer Roland Bourneuf (1970 : 94), « L'espace dans un roman est plus que la somme des lieux décrits ». Loin d'être uniquement une sorte d'ornement chargée d'apporter le pittoresque nécessaire au décor de la fiction, la représentation de l'espace a, elle aussi, inévitablement partie liée avec le programme narratif et le fonctionnement idéologique de l'œuvre romanesque. Les Naufragés de l'intelligence présente ainsi des espaces dont les noms sont forgés dans différentes langues d'Ivoire, mais par exemple, par exemple, en valeur ces idiomes. Des espaces se résument pour l'essentiel, à la République de Mambo, à sa capitale N'Guèlè Ahuè Manou, aux quartiers Eklomiabla et Boribana, à Gnamien-sounankro, à la montagne Effilé Nin N'Djin Boka, à Daoudadougou.

Exemple Boribana et Daoudadougou qui tirent leur origine du malinké, toutes les autres appellations procèdent de la langue agni. Boribana qui signifie « la course est achevée » désigne, dans le roman, un quartier précaire. Son nom est symptomatique de la situation d'une population qui, après maintes expulsions pour loyers impayés, a fini par s'installer dans ce bidonville dont les loyers semblent enfin à portée de bourse. Daoudadougou, lui, signifie simplement « village de Daouda », un village dont le fondateur se nomme Daouda.

Parmi les toponymes agni, l'on note la République de Mambo. Mambo qui signifie littéralement « le monde est cassé, détruit, sens dessus-dessous » est un espace dysphorique où aucune valeur humaine n'est respectée. Mambo figure la fin du monde. Pour ce qui est de N'Guèlè Ahuè Manou, la capitale de la République de Mambo, il pourrait être traduit par « il n'y a plus d'intelligence dans le monde » ; le lecteur est déploré malgré lui dans un espace où toutes les inévitables semblent opérées. Quant à Eklomiabla, c'est-à-dire « si tu m'aimes, viens », il renvoie au quartier précaire dans lequel vit Mo Ehian, la mère des jumeaux, un espace insalubre où se réfugie une population de gens pauvres. S'y rendre oblige à braver les odeurs les plus fétides de la ville ; d'où ce nom porteur de sens qui exprime l'amour vrai que ceux qui s'y hasardent vouent à ceux qu'ils viennent voir.

Gnamien-sounankro, « village de l'homme-Dieu » est Effilé Nin N'Djin Boka, « la montagne de la sueur et du sel » sont des havres de paix où résident la prophétesse Akoua Mando Sounan et sa mère Gnamien Bla. Gnamien-sounankro est un nouveau baptême de N'Guèlè Ahuè Manou, en ce sens qu'il re-humanise le monde à l'aune des préceptes de Dieu ; son positionnement géographique à Effilé Nin N'Djin Boka, le rend cependant difficile d'accès, signe que pour parvenir à la sainteté, il faut d'énormes sacrifices.

Dans Les Naufragés de l'intelligence, Adiaffi choisit donc de nommer les personnages et les espaces dans les langues de la Côte d'Ivoire. Il procède à leur renommation, à leur re-baptême d'autant plus que ces derniers ont connu dans un passé colonial un baptême nian les réalistes et noms africains. Or, comme le dit Géraldine Mére (2012 : 107), Le fait de nommer n'agit pas seulement sur les choses auxquelles il confère un nom, mais également sur les acteurs sociaux qui, en reconnaissance à l'acte lui donne sa valeur, confirmant de fait l'autorité de celui qui nomme, sa légitimité à le faire. Le fait de nommer est un acte de pouvoir, non seulement parce qu'il attribue un nom à une réalité qu'il permet ainsi de s'approprier symboliquement mais aussi parce que, par le même mouvement, il désigne [les personnes qui nommaient] du droit de donner des noms aux réalités qui étaient jusqu'alors les leurs.

En adoptant des stratégies onomastiques informées par les langues du terroir, avec leurs charges culturelles, Adiaffi s'engage dans une procédure de disqualification de la langue du colonisateur en faveur des langues des colonisés. La re-nomination et l'effacement des noms français au profit de nouveaux noms propres symbolisent la reconquête de soi, la reconquête du pouvoir du verbe, des valeurs culturelles locales et de l'autonomie politique. Dans ces sous-tendances qu'Orlandi Eni (1988 : 102) conçoit les choses quand il affirme que « nommer, c'est gouverner ». L'acte de nomination est donc un acte de prise de possession qui marque le droit des nouveaux souverains que sont les Ivoiriens sur cette terre appelée la Côte d'Ivoire. Il symbolise, en conséquence, dans l'imaginaire d'Adiaffi, la dépossession du colonisateur français de cette souveraineté, par l'effacement des noms qu'il avait antérieurement attribués. Dans ce pourquoi, en donnant de nouveaux noms aux personnages, Adiaffi procède au rebaptême des espaces pour en faire un territoire ivoirien, un territoire identitairement marqué. N'est-ce pas du reste le souci de réappropriation identitaire qui le conduit à disjindre la langue d'écriture du roman africain d'expression française en y intégrant comme par effraction de nombreuses tournures lexicales des langues ivoiriennes ?

1.2. Le recours aux formes lexicales ivoiriennes : une écriture subversive

La langue d'écriture du roman africain de langue française est naturellement le français. Le français que les écrivains africains de l'époque coloniale s'évertuaient à manier à la perfection est dévalorisé par les auteurs de la période qui suivent l'indépendance africaines. L'écriture parvient désormais d'un travail de plus en plus conscient sur la langue. Cette reconfiguration sous azimuts de la langue du colonisateur, ce viol artistique de la langue française apparaît de façon osée en Côte d'Ivoire dans Les Naufragés de l'intelligence. La langue d'écriture du roman, que l'on pourrait qualifier d'écriture de la dégénérescence de la langue française, s'illustre par un audacieux mélange des idiomes ivoiriens au français, par une réappropriation de cette langue jadis colonisatrice à travers un emploi exubérant de termes et expressions des langues de Côte d'Ivoire.

Avec Adiaffi, au-delà de la simple mise en évidence d'éléments linguistiques disparates, apparaît un réel souci de représenter toutes les régions de la Côte d'Ivoire. Dans l'effort de mise en relief des matériaux des langues ivoiriennes jusqu'ici peu être le désir que l'on lui prête de vouloir phagocytiser la langue française. Dans cette inclination à la néoglossophagie s'observe à travers les nombreuses lexies empruntées aux langues nationales se réparissant entre les cinq grands groupes linguistiques ivoiriens².

Les Kwas apparaissent, par exemple, par l'usage de mots, expressions et phrases dont la plupart sont agnées "bahifoué" (soit er malfaisant), "komian" (prêtre a nimis), "bosson" (génie), "kodjo" (fil de femme), "ébrô" (l'au-delà), "sika" (argent), "akwaba" (formule de bienvenue chez les Akans), "Aouvo Sounan" et "Aouvo Bian" (homme piouvable), "Yalè Sounan" (homme de souffrance), "Aouvo Bla" (femme piouvable), "djassou" (lève-là), "énai yé na" (aujourd'hui, on ne dort pas), "Missi Gnamien" (Dieu, le Père), "owo" (Dieu en abbaye). Ils sont également représentés à travers les termes culturels telles que « le mapouka » (langue ahizi), « l'abissa » (langue n'zima), « le kotou » (langue baoulé).

L'emploi de ces mots malinkés tels que "kougolo" et "fanicos" (respectivement « tête » et « laveurs d'habits »), "togognini" (commère), "wari" (argent) laissent découvrir les mandés du nord quand les Mandés du sud sont représentés par les mots « zaouli » (danse gouro), « tématé » et « Guégon » (renvoyant respectivement à une danse et à un masque dan).

Outre ces groupes précités, d'autres actes de nomination font référence aux langues du groupe volaïque : "koulotyolo", « Dieu » en sénoufo ; le "boloye" et le "n'goron", deux danses sénoufo. Sont également reconnaissables les Krou avec des mots tels que "bagnon" et "bahoron" que l'on peut traduire respectivement par « bel homme » et « belle femme », "bissa" (queue de buffle que les danseurs tiennent à la main), "kanégnon" (homme dur, courageux) et le terme guéré "gnonsoa" signifiant « Le Tout-Puissant ».

La langue utilisée dans Les Naufragés de l'intelligence de Jean-Marie Adiaffi se ressente ainsi dans la nation ivoirienne à travers un acte d'onomastique qui se résume, pour l'essentiel, dans les anthroponymes et les toponymes puisant abondamment aux sources des langues ivoiriennes. Ce procédé inhabituel de nomination corrompt la langue d'écriture naturelle du roman africain d'expression française en lui imposant un lexique emprunté à diverses langues ivoiriennes. Peut-on alors alléguer qu'Adiaffi demeure dans une perspective de renversement de la situation diglossique existant déjà en Côte d'Ivoire du fait de la colonisation avec un atout, le français, et un basilect, les idiomes ivoiriens ? N'est-ce pas plutôt, pour lui, une façon de réconcilier les langues de l'espace mondial en travaillant à leur coexistence dans l'harmonie ?

2. Du conflit diglossique à la cohabitation pacifique de langues : pour une langue-monde

À l'image des autres États africains, la langue du colonisateur occupe une place importante en Côte d'Ivoire de sorte que certains Ivoiriens développent une sorte d'auto-dénigrement des langues locales qu'ils considèrent comme des langues négatives ou péjorées, des langues d'inculture, des langues vulgaires ; l'insécurité du symbole à l'échelle coloniale, maintenue pendant quelques temps dans les États indépendants, pour sanctionner l'emploi de la langue locale dans la cour de l'école afin de veiller à l'utilisation correcte et exclusive de la langue française, est illustrative de la péjoration des idiomes ivoiriens.

Bien qu'imposé comme langue officielle, le français demeure pour les habitants minoritaires, puisqu'il n'est parlé que par la population scolarisée en milieu urbain. Pour paraphraser Armando Jorge Lopes (1997 : 43) qui décrit une situation semblable au Mozambique, l'on peut avancer qu'il est « excessif et grossier d'affirmer que [la Côte d'Ivoire] est un pays [francophone] », d'autant plus que les locuteurs qui parlent français sont en faible nombre.

Il nous en est de ce rôle de faire les citoyens ivoiriens retourner aux langues ivoiriennes comme pour réclamer une légitimation, une valorisation de ces langues, un certain équilibre de la terre, à entendre comme la réaction à un asservissement culturel guerrier dont la langue du colonisateur est l'instrument le plus efficace. Cette valorisation qui prend un goût de réappropriation ne rejette pas pour autant la langue du colonisateur. Il s'agit pour cela, la présente étude se penche sur quelques aspects remarquables de « défrancisation du français » (Sartre, 1949 : 247) dans le roman, une technique de construction d'un intertexte de la coexistence pratique.

2.1. La « défrancisation du français »

Le partage de l'Afrique à la Conférence de Berlin de 1885 ne s'est pas fait dans le respect de l'homogénéité culturelle. Les États africains actuels se trouvent de ce fait constitués dans des frontières artificielles qui regroupent en réalité, plusieurs peuples, plusieurs terroirs. La fragile homogénéité linguistique qui prévalait à l'époque anticoloniale du fait de la présence dans une même langue de variantes multiples a finalement cédé la place à un multilinguisme, à une situation de diglossie, préjudiciable aux idiomes locaux. Pour juguler les difficultés de l'existence nouvelle de multilinguisme, les colonisés se servent de la langue du colonisateur qui leur a été imposée comme une sorte de pis-aller. Le choix en Côte d'Ivoire du français en tant que langue de communication officielle et d'enseignement relève ainsi du pragmatisme à surmonter les traditions d'ordre ethnique et linguistique.

Plus de cinquante ans après les indépendances cependant l'on constate que le français n'est utilisé de manière fréquente que par la population indigène et surtout urbaine. La majorité des Ivoiriens, ceux qui vivent en milieu rural et ceux rejetés par le système scolaire, demeure en marge du français. Ainsi, à l'initiative du groupe marginalisé par l'éthnocentrisme, naît le nouh⁷, une langue hybride qui essaie de s'imposer au fil des jours comme une véritable lingua franca. Cette langue mélangée prend en compte divers mots issus de différentes langues de Côte d'Ivoire, dont les principales sont le baoulé, le bélé, le gouro, le malinké et le sénoufo. À cette pratique d'emprunts linguistiques, s'ajoute une re-sémantisation de termes français, associée à une déviation sémantique (Tanon-Lora, 2009 : 136). Cette langue qui nous lue, selon l'expression de Sartre, une « défrancisation du français » ne peut être comprise ni par un locuteur s'exprimant exclusivement en français ni par une personne instruite essentiellement dans une langue ivoirienne.

pour l'immortaliser et laisser au rang des plus prestigieuses langues du monde. Ainsi, d'une page à l'autre du roman, se succèdent en des mots, des expressions et des phrases nouvelles dont les plus parlantes sont : « mettre du sable dans son attiéké », « boro », « borailleurs », « enjailleurs », « boro d'enjaillement », « go », « kpakpato », « togognini », « pagneuse », et ces termes et expressions peuvent être catégorisés suivant leurs modes de formations :

Des expressions comme « mettre du sable dans son attiéké » dans la phrase « chaque famille reçut son grain amer de sable dans cet attiéké pimenté » (p. 23) nous montrent une déviation sémantique de la langue française alliée à un terme local. Dans ce contexte, l'"attiéké", terme local très prisé fait à base de manioc, symbolise le pain quotidien ; « mettre du sable dans son attiéké » signifie par conséquent « compromettre son moyen de subsistance, son pain quotidien, sa survie ».

Un autre emploi du nouveau mot a trait à des mots directement issus des langues locales : "kpakpato" et "togognini" désignent respectivement en agni et en malinké, une personne qui ne sait pas tenir sa langue, qui rend et l'esprit des uns en dénigrant les autres. Dans cet ordre d'idées, un terme comme "bôrô" qui signifie « sac » en malinké traduit l'abondance.

Sont aussi repérables des lexies formées à partir du radical d'un mot d'une langue ivoirienne suivi d'un suffixe français : c'est le cas de "borailleurs", c'est-à-dire adeptes du "bôrô d'enjaillement"⁸, et dans un sens plus large, personne portée vers l'ouïe qui peut lui procurer une joie et un plaisir débordant.

Une dernière classe de mots nouveaux que caractérise le roman est celle des inventions lexicales réalisées à partir d'un radical français ou anglais : "enjailleurs", "enjaillement" procèdent de « joie » et « enjoy » respectivement en français et en anglais ; "pagneuse" ressortit au radical français « pagne » et au suffixe féminin « -euse » (adepte de) et.

Le nouveau mot est donc une langue mixte qui prend en compte l'histoire de la Côte d'Ivoire en assumant sa multiculturalité. Pourquoi, il apparaît et se forme comme une langue du syncrétisme linguistique, mais surtout comme une langue d'union et de tolérance par la cohabitation harmonieuse des langues des colonisés et de celle du colonisateur. L'on pourra conclure, par ce mélange des idiomes, qu'Adiaffi édulcore le conflit des langues comme pour en appeler à l'avènement d'un interlecte⁹ du dialogue des langues.

2.2. Le mélange des langues : pour un interlecte du dialogue des langues

Dans Les Naufragés de l'intelligence, Adiaffi part du français, la langue héritée de la colonisation, pour la modeler, la disordre en y introduisant de façon pléthorique un lexique directement des langues ivoiriennes. En agissant ainsi, il semble, d'emblée, phagocyter la langue du colonisateur en vue de valoriser celles des colonisés. Le grand nombre de mots nouveaux qui traversent toute l'œuvre a même pour but de convaincre le lecteur qu'Adiaffi ne s'inscrit ni dans une logique de diglossie ni dans un processus de néoglossophagie. Son projet est une réelle exhortation à la mise en œuvre d'une langue intermédiaire qui prendra en compte les langues des colonisés et celles des colonisés sans apriorisme.

L'on pourrait certes arguer que ce type de projet d'allure planétaire a déjà été pensé depuis 1887 par Zamenhof avec l'espéranto¹⁰, mais ce cas de figure fait la part belle à une langue à caractère distinctif. Avec Zamenhof, l'intérêt se en réalité porté sur les langues européennes. Avec Jean-Marie Adiaffi, le projet s'internationalise apparemment d'autant plus qu'il s'intéresse à la fois aux idiomes au trois fois qualifiés de langues et à ceux qui, depuis l'aube de la colonisation, ont été rabaisés au rang de dialectes, de patois, de parlers.

Un idiome ne s'affirme néanmoins pas comme lingua franca continentale ou planétaire simplement par ses qualités linguistiques. À ce titre, il doit adjoindre celle du poids politique, économique, militaire du ou des pays qui le parlent et qui parviennent à l'imposer justement grâce à leur hégémonie. Les avantages linguistiques incontestables du nouchi, cette langue métisse qui fusionne le français, l'anglais et les idiomes ivoiriens, sont un atout important voire une condition nécessaire, mais à eux seuls, ils ne sauraient constituer une condition suffisante.

Le nouchi de vra, pour s'imposer, impose un pouvoir politique sinon égal, du moins comparable à celui des pays dont les langues s'exportent aujourd'hui à travers les colloques internationaux ou autres rencontres d'une telle envergure. Sa seule chance de diffusion et de survie réside, à ce effet, dans l'intégration des pays africains. La langue nouchi doit pour ce faire, s'affiner et se vulgariser à partir du fonds national ivoirien d'où elle tire son origine, mais elle de vra surtout s'élendre au lexique des autres langues africaines et des français parlés sur le continent; ce qui lui permet de s'allier le pouvoir politique des unions régionales entre les États naturellement voisins et dont les langues et les cultures aux frontières se ressemblent avant d'arriver à terme à l'étape de l'Union Africaine qui prendra en définitive sur elle d'aller au-devant du monde pour porter haut l'idéologie du dialogue des langues qu'elle véhicule.

Conclusion

La langue est un puissant canal d'inoculation culturelle, l'en reprise coloniale française ne pouvait promouvoir que le français au détriment des idiomes africains considérés comme inférieurs. De ce fait, sont dénigrés alors que la langue du colonisateur est valorisée, et même survalorisée. Des structures internationales, comme la francophonie, informe un impérialisme linguistique fût-ce qu'Adiaffi rejette dans Les Naufragés de l'intelligence. Pour lutter contre cette forme moins apparente de colonialisme, il attaque de front la langue du colonisateur en rebaptisant les personnages et les espaces par des noms locaux et en corrodant la langue d'écriture du roman africain par l'introduction, par effraction, d'un lexique profondément des langues ivoiriennes.

Il insère, en outre, un véritable mariage entre les langues du terroir ivoirien et celle du colonisateur par l'utilisation du nouchi, un idiome spécifique à la Côte d'Ivoire, qui semble cannibaliser la langue française en la dénaturant et en la désubstantivant. Tous ces procédés d'absorption du français et du code langagier classique du roman africain d'expression française n'aboutissent cependant pas à la négligence, comme le fait à tort Rangira Gallimore. Le français, même formellement corrompu, demeure, en effet, en symbiose avec les autres lettres du roman.

Par conséquent, le mélange des langues, Adiaffi considère ainsi la diglossie, et l'idéologie de hiérarchisation des langues, pour militer en faveur d'un interlacte de la coexistence des langues, un interlacte du dialogue des langues. Il agit en ce sens, pour la promotion d'une culture-monde.

ABSTRACT: Cultural terrorism in Nous, enfants de la tradition by Gaston-Paul Effa

This discussion focuses on the textual deployment of the memory-culture motif. It reveals that Gaston-Paul Effa brings together the tools of postcolonialism such as the archetype of evil, demonization or inhumanization, monism and utopianism to express what culture stands for. Thus, Nous enfants de la tradition, can be read as the staging of "cultural terrorism," a concept derived from the "intellectual terrorism" of Jean Sévillia.

KEYWORDS: cultural terrorism, monism, congruent narrator, narrator-subject, desired identity

La notion de terrorisme culturel fait écho à celle du « terrorisme intellectuel » développée par Jean Sévillia. Il en donne la définition suivante :

[...] Le terrorisme intellectuel est un mécanisme littéraire. Mais d'un littérarisme parélin, hypocrisie. Il vise à ôter la parole au contradicteur, devenu une bête à abattre [...] en laissant fuser des mots. Les mots des grandes consciences. Les mots qui tiennent (Sévillia, 2000 : 10)

Les mécanismes littéraires du terrorisme intellectuel relevés par cet auteur, à l'analyse, se retrouvent dans la sphère culturelle et aboutissent à ce que Tzvetan Todorov (2004) appelle les « abus de la mémoire », élan entendu le lien existant entre mémoire et culture :

La culture, au sens que les ethnologues donnent à ce mot, est essentiellement une affaire de mémoire : c'est la connaissance d'un certain nombre de codes du comportement et la capacité de s'en servir. [...] Posséder une culture c'est d'abord connaître ses manières d'agir et de penser. Un être déculture est celui qui n'a jamais acquis la culture de ses ancêtres, ou qui l'a oubliée et perdue.

(Todorov, 2004 [1995] : 21)

Par conséquent la notion de terrorisme culturel met l'accent sur un usage dogmatique, littérariste de la mémoire-tradition évoquée par l'expression « culture des ancêtres ».

S'exprimant sur les lieux d'expression de ce littérarisme du penser et du faire, Jean Sévillia écrivait que « l'histoire, l'art, la littérature, la science ou l'écologie forment des terrains de chasse pour le terrorisme intellectuel » (2000 : 11). Et justement dans la sphère littéraire, le roman de Gaston-Paul Effa, *Nous, enfants de la tradition*¹ (2008) se laisse lire sous ce prisme. Il es à l'examen, un lieu d'expression, d'expérience voire de mise en fiction du terrorisme ou du totalitarisme culturel. Ses mécanismes tels que formalisés par Jean Sévillia et Zvezdan Todorov sont opérationnels dans ce texte. Il fait l'objet de ce de étude es de les mettre en exergue et de voir comment en dénonçant un usage fallacieux de la mémoire-tradition, Gaston-Paul Effa la rétrograde au profit d'autres faits.

1. Les abus de la mémoire dans Nous, enfants de la tradition : le procès d'une identité subie

Jean Sévillia et Zvezdan Todorov ont analysé les mécanismes du totalitarisme. Pour le premier, il est manifeste dans le terrorisme intellectuel et pour le second dans les abus de la mémoire ou le totalitarisme mémoriel. Les outils théoriques que chacun utilise semblent différents d'un point de vue terminologique mais se rejoignent dans la sémantique et la portée.

Pour Jean Sévillia, le terrorisme intellectuel use fondamentalement de deux procédés : la diffusion de l'archétype du mal et l'assimilation de l'adversaire à cet archétype. Sur le premier mécanisme, il donne ces précisions :

Les catégories varient, mais le procédé reste le même. Il consiste d'abord à imprimer dans l'imaginaire un archétype du mal. Depuis la guerre, cette funeste figure est incarnée par le fascisme, le capitalisme, l'impérialisme, le colonialisme, le xénophobe, le racisme et le partisan de l'ordre moral. Ces étiquettes, au minimum, déforment l'réalité; au pire, elles menent dévolées par des mains expertes, elles revêtent un sens indéfini, dont l'élargissement permet d'englober toutes ce que les idéologues vouent aux gémonies.

On remarque qu'en quelque mode opératoire, la mise en place d'un archétype du mal génère la classification, la catégorisation des hommes, des modes de pensée et de faire. Ainsi, son du côté du mal, tous ceux qui pensent autrement auxquels on attribue insidieusement les étiquettes consistantes de l'archétype du mal. Pour ce faire, le terrorisme intellectuel puise dans la mémoire, le passé, en invoquant des stèles négatifs que sont le nazisme, le fascisme et les attribue fallacieusement à toute personne qui se démarque par sa position. Le terrorisme intellectuel apparaît ainsi comme un système autoritaire, dogmatique.

Il est subdivisé figée et infligée de la pensée conduisant nécessairement à ce second procédé relevé par Jean Sévillia :

Ensuite, la technique habituelle conduit à assimiler l'adversaire à l'archétype du mal. L'effet est un amalgame et surditement issu d'un qui prendra le risque, par exemple, d'être traité de fasciste ou de raciste ? L'attribution peut être explicite, ou s'effectuer par insinuation, ouvrant la porte à des procès d'intention ou d'opposition peut être accusé non sur ce qu'il pense, mais sur les pensées qu'on lui prête.

(Sévillia, 2000 : 10)

Il ressort de ce propos l'objectif final de la mise en place du manichéisme à travers la diffusion de l'archétype du mal / la diabolisation. Il n'est plus question d'opposer des arguments, de discuter pour comprendre. Il s'agit plutôt d'intimider, de terroriser, de culpabiliser, de disqualifier l'autre. Il apparaît de ce fait un lien étroit entre le terrorisme intellectuel et la pensée unique. Et qui n'est pas sans rappeler certains outils du totalitarisme identifiés par Todorov dans ses réflexions sur « la mémoire du mal ». Il s'agit du « monisme » et de l'« utopisme ».

À propos du monisme, Todorov note que :

Les deux grands principes – au nom de la collectivité et au nom de l'individu – reçoivent des traitements différents. Le totalitarisme rejette ouvertement les deux – qui sont également l'objet de critiques de la part des conservateurs. Et n'est plus le je de chaque individu qui est valorisé ici, c'est le nous du groupe. Logiquement le grand moyen pour assurer cette autonomie, le pluralisme, est écarté à son tour et remplacé par son contraire, le monisme.

(Todorov, 2000 / 28)

Il se dégage de ce texte explicite que le monisme, outil du totalitarisme, exige l'adhésion spirituelle, l'unification voire l'uniformisation et aboutit à la dégradation de l'individu à travers la pensée unique imposée. Et procédé prend racine dans l'utopisme qui en est l'objectif :

L'utopisme tire son nom de l'utopie qui n'est qu'une fabrication intellectuelle, une image de la société idéale. Les fonctions de l'utopie peuvent être multiples, elle peut servir à nourrir la réflexion ou à critiquer le monde existant. Seul l'utopisme cherche à introduire l'utopie dans le monde réel. L'utopisme est nécessairement lié à la violence. [...] L'utopisme possède une tendance immanente au despotisme.

(Todorov, 2000 / 35)

Des mécanismes du totalitarisme de la pensée ainsi identifiés sont à l'œuvre dans Nous, enfants de la tradition à l'analyse de deux caractéristiques de la tradition mises en scène par Gaston-Paul Effa : il s'agit des principes directeurs et des méthodes de la tradition en tant que lieu de la mémoire et de la culture.

Dans ses réflexions sur la construction de l'auditoire comme stratégie argumentative, Ruth Amossy fait les remarques suivantes :

On a parlé de l'auditoire comme construction de l'orateur. Mais on n'a pas assez souligné le fait que l'image de l'allocataire projetée par le discours construit en soi une stratégie. [...] Et qui se donne à voir dans le discours, ce n'est pas seulement la façon dont le locuteur perçoit son ou ses partenaires, c'est aussi la façon dont il leur présente une image d'eux-mêmes susceptibles de favoriser son entreprise de persuasion. À la limite l'orateur travaille à élaborer une image de l'auditoire dans laquelle celui-ci voudra se reconnaître. Il cherche d'infléchir des opinions et des conduites en lui tendant un miroir [...].

(Amossy, 2010 [2000] / 59)

Dans cette perspective, le discours traditionnel, tel que mis en scène par Gaston Effa, projette sur l'alloctuaire deux archétypes : celui du bien et par ricochet celui du mal. La pensée est ainsi structurée par le principe du manichéisme. Cette stratégie a pour finalité de soutenir que l'alloctuaire qui se laisse irrémédiablement porter par la tradition appartient au clan du bien. C'est ce que souligne ce discours tenu par Osele, initialement représentant de la tradition :

Je n'avais pas non plus à éprouver la tentation de me révolter contre l'enfermement [...] Au regard de ma mère qui gouvernait mes pas, ou tout comme au regard de la tribu fang ou en mère, j'étais un modèle d'équilibre, de sérénité, d'obéissance tranquille. Jamais je ne me plaignais, jamais je n'exprimais de critiques. Mon égalité d'humeur était un bonheur pour le clan.

(INET, pp. 40, 41)

L'explicitation « j'étais un modèle » est inscriptive à plus d'un titre. Le lexème « modèle » se rapporte en effet à l'exemple-type à imiter, au prototype. Subséquemment les termes « obéissance tranquille », « jamais je ne me plaignais », « jamais je n'exprimais de critiques » acquièrent une sémantique pérenne. Ils enseignent que le silence, l'absence d'esprit critique fondent le bien selon la mémoire-tradition. Ainsi, à travers ce personnage-prototype et son discours, il est diffusé dans l'imaginaire de l'alloctuaire le principe selon lequel l'archétype du bien, dans la logique de la mémoire-tradition, est synonyme de soumission totale malgré le sentiment « d'enfermement » souligné par Osele. En suivant ce principe, le personnage se présente et se présente comme « un bon enfant de la tradition » au regard de l'expression « mon égalité d'humeur était un bonheur pour le clan ». Le discours implicite est que l'archétype du mal, « le mauvais enfant de la tradition », a pour corollaire la remise en cause, le questionnement voire la contestation de certains principes de la tradition. On est donc en présence d'un cas de monisme, de tentative d'échouement du « je » au profit du « nous » du lire. Cette lecture est renforcée par la signification du nom donné au héros-narrateur par les « dirigeants des âmes de la tribu » : Osele.

- Osele, chez nous, c'est un âne.

- Un âne ? C'est un objet très important, c'est lui qui porte sur ses épaules la vie de la tribu. Un âne ne se fatigue pas. Dans les déserts, il peut porter des centaines de kilomètres sous le soleil, avec les bagages pour toute la famille, sans manger ni boire. Et chaque fois qu'il y aura des larmes dans la famille, c'est lui qui les essuiera. [...]

Le choix d'Osele appelle un remous de forces dont on existe individuellement n'est que l'expression aléatoire et relativement négligeable. Si j'avais été envoyé ici, c'est que mon nom m'interdisait d'être ce que mon désir voulait que je fusse. [...]

On m'avait dit ma voix. Je devais nourrir les hommes. L'âne devait nourrir les hommes. Osele allait nourrir les hommes. Tout le monde pouvait mourir autour de moi [en France], ma femme pouvait me quitter, mes enfants aussi, l'essentiel était que la tradition reste sauve. L'âne continuera à servir, à nourrir, à porter, à conduire, à donner, à se donner, jusqu'à ce qu'il n'y ait plus d'homme du loup [...] La tradition avait dictée et j'avais les yeux bandés.

(NET, pp. 65, 75, 102, nous soulignons)

Le bon enfant est l'esclave du clan, la bête de somme. Le héros-narrateur insiste sur sa réification symbolique de la condition culturelle. Monisme et utopisme sont ainsi opérationnels dans le texte. L'idéal humain, qui consiste à aider celui qui est dans le besoin, devient la radiation d'un dogme, un principe imposé, une condition à atteindre. Comme le souligne Todorov (2000 : 35), « l'utopisme cherche à insérer la perfection dans le monde », d'où sa tendance au despotisme que l'on ressent dans le séquençage du texte de Gascon-Paul Effa qui est également manifeste dans les étiologies attribuées à celui qui tente de prendre ses distances. Il est conformément aux remarques de Jean Sévillia, assimilé à l'archétype du mal afin d'insinuer, de terroriser et donc de dissuader. Dans la logique, le personnage indépendant d'esprius qualifié dans Nous, enfants de la tradition, « d'égoïste » (p. 11), de celui qui « porte le désespoir sur son village » (p. 103), de « naïf » (p. 137), « d'objet d'exaspération, sinon de honte », (p. 152), « d'abominable criminel » (p. 121). Ces invectives traduisent l'intolérance, cette disposition mentale aux origines de l'utopisme.

Pour garder la mainmise sur le personnage-narrateur, le discours-radiation ne s'interdit pas de convoquer le discours religieux manipulé, aux effets obscurantistes :

Ma vie pouvait-elle avoir d'autre sens que l'enfermement dans le don, la pénitence inéluctable ? [...] Je ressentais saisi d'angoisse à la pensée que l'aîné de la famille pouvait être en état de péché mortel s'il n'assumait pas sa tribu africaine.

(NET, p. 36)

On remarque la erreur dissuasive qu'il ressent à l'idée de s'émaner par à travers l'expression « saisi d'angoisse ».

Outre le maniérisme comme principe majeur structurel du terrorisme culturel dans Nous, enfants de la tradition, Gascon Effa met aussi en scène la méthodologie héliariste employée par la radiation qui fonde son œuvre.

L'une des méthodes est l'enseignement par l'exemple. Sur la portée de cette stratégie, on peut noter, à la suite de Dominique Maingueneau, que sa force persuasive « réside dans le fait qu'il met en relation un objet problématique avec un objet déjà intégré par les représentations du référentiel » (1991 : 246). Le principe sur lequel est fondé l'exemple est qu'il invite à réfléchir, à partir du cas particulier, la loi ou la structure qu'il révèle. Cela précisé, l'enseignement-radiationnel dans ce roman convoque deux types d'exemple : l'exemple contemporain et celui tiré du passé avec la même finalité d'insinuer.

Pour ce qui est de l'exemple tiré du passé, il s'agit d'une légende enseignée aux enfants de la radiation :

Il était d'un autre temps d'une main coupée. Elle ne leur laissait entendre que cette main s'était une fois dressée contre la radiation : l'homme auquel elle appartenait avait refusé de payer les funérailles de son père, et le village entier avait été rendu le coupable au sol, lui avait été hachée la gorge et arrachés les bras. Il dérivait les modifications de texture et de couleur des tissus charnels. On pouvait imaginer des choses sombres qui donnaient au corps un aspect marbré [...] L'horreur me revint lorsque, allongé sur mon lit, je ne remplai le cheminement de mes mains, me préparant à recevoir ce que la vie, à la suite de la légende, m'apprenait

« L'horreur » ressentie par le personnage est voulue par cette légende, par le jeu d'une stratégie de dissuasion efficace qui même en témoigne le geste réflexe de ne pas remplir sa main à la suite d'une simple réminiscence de cet exemple. Le détail qui est lisible dans la description du traitement infligé au corps du malade a pour objectif de marquer durablement les esprits. Le mécanisme du terrorisme culturel est renforcé par ce second exemple qui est du registre du vécu, ce qui atteste sa valeur terrorisante paralysante :

Une fois, l'un d'eux s'avantura. [...] Avec l'aide d'un être qui accomplissait son destin, l'homme avait offensé les morts. Jouer avec la tradition, quel crime abominable ! On le lui fit bien savoir. Pendant des années, il arpenta les rues du village, errant vaguement en quête de quelque chose. Il balayait les chemins et ramassait toutes les choses en place après le marché hebdomadaire. Sans doute les choses auraient-elles pu se fixer à cette punition si la maladie n'avait, avec une vigueur nouvelle, balayé le terrain en emportant ses enfants. À eux-ci quel que soit leur âge, s'éclaircissaient en quelques mois.

L'implicite du discours, ici, est que les recommandations de la tradition relèveraient de l'ordre du divin. La malédiction divine détruit tout manquement. L'explicite est que le corps du malade est considéré comme un adversaire, un ennemi à dompter, à éradiquer, à exterminer. Il est criminalisé. Des exemples ne sont pas d'avisement. Tous ceux qui tenteront de s'inscrire dans la remise en cause de la tradition auront un sort identique. On est sans cesse dans la configuration discursive et idéique du terrorisme, du totalitarisme, de l'abus de la mémoire collective.

Comme effet rhétorique, le roman de Gaston Effa met en scène un type particulier de narrateur : il s'agit de celui que, Georgette Madebe, s'appuyant sur Greimas, appelle le « narrateur congruent ». Il explique :

(Madebe, 2007 : 42)

La notion de « statut impersonnel » aide à comprendre que ce type de narrateur n'est pas un discours impersonnel, et par conséquent silencieux. Lorsque ce dernier parle, c'est le plus souvent la collectivité qu'on évoque. Son « je » est l'équivalent du « nous ».

Il baigne dans une identité vivante, c'est-à-dire une identité transformatrice, impersonnelle. Il est narrateur, en effet, voire discours identitaire dans une logique fonctionnelle, voire en phase avec les smogonies et autres axiologies du milieu social. Sa présence élocutoire est en conséquence vide, ce qui en fait un non-sujet et cela est perceptible dans ces propos d'Osele, le héros-narrateur :

Je suis fait pour nourrir ma famille. [...] Ma vie était réglée et mon rôle à disserter en tous ses détails, et par là je m'oubliais, je me dépossédais de mon amour-propre pour m'approcher d'une identité nulle et neutre, celle de « soutien de la famille ». [...] J'aurais pu être autre chose, j'aurais pu ne pas être tel que. Mais Osele, la bête donc je porte le nom, est une énigme et je suis une énigme à moi-même. La tradition avait dit : « j'avais les yeux bandés.

(INET, pp. 55, 102)

On s'aperçoit ainsi que la tradition assume la fonction de destinataire-manipulateur dont le pouvoir-faire se résume à la production du programme de vie de la personne. On est ainsi dans le registre de ce qu'Alain Finkielkraut qualifie de « la défaite de la pensée » (1987 : 38). Il est débouche, dans sa construction, à une transparence identitaire au regard des termes « identité nulle et neutre » et surtout à une identité subie comme en témoignent les expressions « ma vie était réglée et mon rôle », « la tradition avait dit ». Mais le roman de Gascon Effa pose ce constat pour le dépasser.

2. La mémoire-tradition rétrogradée dans Nous, enfants de la tradition : pour une identité voulue

On remarque, dans le parcours narratif du personnage Osele, l'« anagnosis » aristotélicien. Il est le témoin de la « reconnaissance ou plus exactement le passage de l'ignorance à la connaissance par le moyen du drame » (1994, T. 2 : 2109). En effet, sa séparation d'avec son épouse et ses enfants en raison de l'emprise de la tradition sur lui a été un élément déclencheur d'une prise de conscience. Il est à l'origine d'une interrogation sur la tradition et à une redéfinition de son rapport avec ses principes. Il est en lien avec sa mère en portant les marques :

- Il est Osele ? Ta voix a bien mué. [...] Elle se laisse longuement puis est d'une voix dans laquelle passait une sorte de désespoir.

- Tu ne veux plus m'attendre que je te demande, tu refuses ? Je n'ai pas mangé depuis trois jours, et je ne peux pas me laver, les frères ont utilisé tout le savon que tu as envoyé. Je t'ai vu devoir prendre une attitude de fermeté.

- Écoute, maman, je te prie de ne pas insister. Je t'en prie à découvrir la vérité de ce que tu affirmes, c'est seulement si elle m'est démontrée que je renverrai l'argent. Elle m'est venue sans dire un mot et t'en a dit.

Demeuré seul, je réfléchis. Au fond, je commençais que j'agissais en égoïsme, mais tel n'était pas en contradiction avec ce que je t'en voyais être une manière de me protéger. J'étais heureux d'avoir dit non pour la première fois. [...] Je sentais que, depuis ton refus, un rapport nouveau s'était établi entre ma famille africaine et moi, certainement plus réel parce que fondé sur la situation telle qu'elle était et non telle qu'elle aurait dû être.

(1978 [161]). La parole est incarnée par le discours de l'ontologie ; un discours autoritaire, menaçant et fondamental de la tradition. À l'opposé, la « parole-actuelle » est définie par Tzvetan Todorov comme le fait « d'accomplir un acte qui n'est pas simplement l'énonciation de la parole. La parole est généralement accompagnée, pour celui qui parle, d'un risque. Il ne faut pas avoir peur pour parler. La parole correspond au silence, la parole se lie à la révolte. [...] La parole-actuelle est considérée avant tout comme un risque » (1978 [1971] : 24, 25). Sur cette base, la réplique d'Osele constitue une « parole-actuelle », un discours-révolte dans un contexte d'oppression, de menace de mort. Elle témoigne de sa volonté de résister, du dépassement de la peur paralysante. Il s'est forgé une nouvelle âme qui s'adresse aux dirigeants des âmes de la tribu.

La conséquence de cette mutation du narrateur-personnage est la fracture énonciative identifiable dans les dernières pages du roman de Gascon-Paul Effa. On passe en effet d'un narrateur-congruent, précédemment évoqué, à un narrateur-sujet. De ce fait le « je » d'Osele n'est plus exclusivement l'expression d'une intersubjectivité. En clair, ce narrateur-personnage n'est plus le porteur-parole de la tribu, comme il l'était de coutume, mais ne fait désormais, que porter sa parole. Du coup, on est passé de l'intersubjectivité à l'auto-subjectivité d'une « présente élocutoire vide, impersonnelle » à une « présente élocutoire pleine, personnelle » (Madebe, 2007 : 58), d'une sous-évaluation de soi dans la surestimation de la tradition à l'affirmation de soi. C'est propos, parmi d'autres, corroboré par l'assertion :

« J'en étais bien fini des appréhensions et des faiblesses du passé. Mais que dis-je ? Dans mon entrée en résistance, je voyais une aisance, une élégance souveraine qui m'enthousiasmait [...] Faire ce que je veux, aller et venir, être libre, disposer de mes biens, dire enfin « je » après une vie passée à dire « ils », « eux », « nous » ; cela ne m'empêcherait pas d'être, par ailleurs, suffisamment satisfait, pour poursuivre mon existence ordinaire. J'étais loin de ce personnage faible que j'avais été. [...] J'ai brisé les liens, rejeté dans la vase la lourde amarre pourrissante. Nous pouvons nous communiquer nos idées, notre savoir, ce que nous appelons notre culture, ce qui est d'ailleurs légère et impersonnelle qui affleure. Notre liberté n'est pas bien-être, seul bien irrécusablement à nous et imparagable. » (NET, pp. 149, 157)

En instaurant la situation finale du récit dans cette perspective, Nous, enfants de la tradition se donne finalement à lire dans une dynamique de construction de soi et se pose comme une défense voire une valorisation de l'identité voulue.

Conclusion

Les procédés du totalitarisme que sont l'intimidation, la violence, la diabolisation, l'intolérance, par la mise en place de l'archétype du mal ainsi que le monisme et l'ultrapopisme formalisés par Jean Sévillia et Tzvetan Todorov ont été convoqués dans la construction de Nous, enfants de la tradition de Gascon-Paul Effa. Ces dispositifs ont servi, dans ce roman, à peindre les excès de la tradition-mémoire, son usage fallacieux et oppressant, qui sont l'expression de ce que nous avons appelé le « terrorisme »

Culturel. La finalité d'une telle esthétique, est la relativisation du rôle de la tradition au profit d'autres valeurs dont le fondement est la liberté. En conséquence, ce texte est apparu, à l'analyse, comme un plaidoyer pour une identité voulue en lieu et place d'une identité subie.

ABSTRACT: Thinking about Death in Vladimir Jankelevitch's Work

Why is someone's death always a sort of scandal? Why does such a normal event elicit in its witnesses curiosity as much as horror? Ever since there have been people, who have died, how has the moral not gone unused to this natural yet always at the same time a scandalous phenomenon? Why is he surprised every time a living human passes away, as if every time this happened for the first time?¹

KEYWORDS: death, before, while, after, unutterable, indescribable

Vladimir Jankélévitch, philosophe et musicologue, est né à Bourges, le 31 août 1903, dans une famille d'intellectuels russes. Il a marqué la philosophie française contemporaine par sa réflexion riche et subtile qui l'a singularisé par la profondeur de ses méditations sur La Mort, L'Irréversible et la nostalgie, Le Je ne-sais-quoi et le Presque-rien. Professeur à la Sorbonne pendant près de trente ans, il a marqué par sa personnalité aussi bien que par ses cours de morale et de métaphysique de nombreuses générations d'étudiants.

Il célèbre le mystère de l'insaisissable, l'évanescence du silence, le sens de la vie, le scandale de la disparition et porte un regard neuf sur la musique qu'il n'a jamais séparé de ses écrits philosophiques qui expriment l'inexprimable fécond de la vie, de la liberté, de l'amour. « Par sa fidélité à Bergson et sa méfiance envers les écoles de pensée Jankélévitch fut convaincu de rester à l'écart des modes et des troupes philosophiques et préféra la conversation de ses amis musiciens. » (Rouvière, 2010) En tant que philosophe, il n'a suscité d'envie, sa solitude érudite, peu-être, à son inaccessibilité.

En 1966 il publie La Mort, livre ardent et le plus original et le plus significatif de son œuvre philosophique qui s'est fait remarquer par ses analyses de l'amour, de la mauvaise conscience, du mal, du pardon, du mensonge, de l'impresscriptible, de l'humour, de l'ironie, du pur et de l'impur, finissant dans la synthèse du Paradoxe de la morale. « Ce maître du paradoxe moral décrit la mort comme un déficit de la vie et de l'être et comme une irruption brusque dans le cours naturel du monde. La mort est un événement qui sort de l'ordinaire, c'est-à-dire un miracle, car elle fait fi de l'ordre des choses et, en même temps, elle est la loi universelle de toute vie. » (Jerphagnon, 1969)

Le livre aborde la question qui hante la réflexion sur l'homme, à savoir l'événement le plus banal et à la fois le plus scandaleux par lequel l'être s'abîme dans le mystère. La mort est une expérience si commune aux individus et tellement unique, es. Elle qui donne son sens à la vie. Dans ce sens, le livre de Jankélévitch est un livre non pas sur la mort mais sur la vie. Il disait que la vie plonge les racines de sa unité dans le non-être.

La désinvolture géniale de l'auteur est de dire dans les 467 pages du livre que de la mort il n'y a rien à dire. Il fait une plaidoirie pour la vie, car la mort n'est pas le contraire de la vie, elle en fait partie. Il s'explique pourquoi parler au tour de la mort est parler de la vie. C'est qui fait la valeur de notre vie c'est aussi son unité due spécialement au fait qu'elle est limitée par la mort.

Jankélévitch a une attitude très positive dans ce livre structuré en trois chapitres. Comme le miracle de l'œuvre musicale, le miracle de La mort consiste dans le fait que dans sa consécution temporelle, elle édifie l'unité d'une image d'ensemble qui s'accomplit successivement, s'arrondit et finit en devenant un édifice. Il marque « les trois temps du Temps » de la mort dans les trois chapitres du livre : La mort en deçà de la mort, La mort dans l'instant mortel et *La mort au-delà de la mort*².

1. La mort en deçà de la mort c'est le chapitre le plus long du livre. Il s'agit de la mort durant la vie, qui appartient en fait à l'existence du vivant, car « le sujet ne se trouve pas dans l'état de mort durant son existence, ni dans celui de l'existence, une fois décédé. » (Lavoie, de Konink & Blondeau, 2009 : 68) Comme par ailleurs dans ce livre, dans ce chapitre l'auteur parle au tour et à propos, jamais de la mort. Par la méditation de la mort l'auteur se rend compte qu'il « n'y a rien à penser sur la mort » (Jankélévitch, 1977 : 40). « Faute de penser la mort il ne nous reste, semble-t-il, que deux solutions : ou bien penser sur la mort, autour de la mort, à propos de la mort ; ou bien penser à autre chose qu'à la mort, et par exemple à la vie. » (Idem : 40)

Il ajoute une autre complication à la mort c'est que nous sommes des êtres pensants. Jankélévitch analyse la mort comme profondeur et comme futur, en continuant la vision de Bergson qui avait remarqué le caractère des réflexes de l'intelligence. Mais il n'est pas, comme son maître, un philosophe tragique, un philosophe du mal, du néant mais un philosophe de l'affirmation positive. Pour lui, c'est la mort qui donne son sens à la vie, comme l'élan vital bergsonien. « Le souci du futur exprime le présent-à-venir de la mort » (Idem : 51), tandis que l'incertitude de la nature est toujours le contraire, de nous soustraire cette fin. La pensée de la mort est une pensée contre nature : « Nous craignons, en recherchant la mort en deçà de la mort, de ne rien trouver. Au premier abord, en effet, tout me parle de l'être, et rien ne me parle du non-être. Tout me parle de la vie, et même l'idée de mortalité; rien ne me parle de la mort, et pas même la philosophie de la mort. » (Idem : 57)

Pour Jankélévitch, on ne peut pas s'empêcher de penser à la mort mais on peut s'empêcher d'en parler. Et si l'on parle, on le fait par euphémisme et par inversion apophatique. La mort est liée au vieillissement et au temps irréversible. Tous les hommes comprennent instantanément le mot « qui est une allusion imprécise à notre misère, ce mot après lequel il n'y a plus rien à dire, ce mot si court qui en dit si long » (Idem : 60).

L'organe observable de la vie est la mort et l'observable du langage bien au innarrable, à l'innommable et à l'indivisible de la mort en deçà. « Le caractère évusif de la finitude mortelle est comme un défi au logos » (Idem : 60). Devant la mort,

Celui qui esLe le sujeLdu verbe mourir change son discours en silence (qui esLa la mauvaise Conscience du beau parleur) ou sa philosophie esLune philosophie-à-propos qui, par la « voie oblique de l'euphémie, les cercles de la périphrase, les zigzags de la conversation » (Idem 7 62), esquivé le mouvement d'aligne qui désigneraiLde manière transitive, le Complément d'objet appelé mortL

La mortConstitue le non-être de l'homme et le non-sens de l'essence, elle esL le Non absolu. Mais ce non-être Connaît finalement le sens de la vie. Parce que la mort existe, il faut absolument respecter la vie de l'homme. « Naissance et mort (...) sont mutuellement la condition l'une de l'autre. » (Schopenhauer, 1991 7 160) La mort esL le moyen de rendre unique ce que nous vivons, et c'est ce qui nous la vivons Comme une tragédie, car « la mort nous fait douter de la raison d'être de l'être » (Jankélévitch, op.cit. 7 69). Et qui fait la valeur de notre vie esL son unicité, mais aussi sa limite, ce qui n'arrive qu'une fois dans toute l'éternité, vous. L'auteur introduit le terme de hapax pour exprimer ce qui esL vécu pour la première et pour la dernière fois. Toutes les fois sont les premières-dernières fois, les fois premières-ultimes.

Et qui Confère une sorte de positivité au néant mortel c'esL Dieu, l'amour et la liberté. Devant la mort en effet, Jankélévitch parle du silence indéchiffrable et du silence ineffable. « L'ineffable est inexprimable parce qu'on manque de mots pour exprimer ou définir un mystère aussi riche, parce qu'il y aurait sur lui infiniment à dire, immensément à suggérer, interminablement à raconter; la mort, elle, est indicible parce qu'il n'y a, dès l'abord, absolument rien à en dire » (Idem 7 83). Il dit que la mort esL apocryphe, le dernier souffle replie l'être dans le même absolu.

L'organe-obscur de la vie esL la mort. L'homme esL destiné à mourir 7 « le mortel, bien avant d'être moribond, est mortuus » (Idem 7 92). Dès qu'un homme esL né il esL assez vieux pour mourir. Dans ce chapitre l'auteur introduit l'idée de temps limité en disant qu'en être une vie longue et une vie infinie esL une distinction absolue. Un homme éternel esL intouchable, c'esL un non-sens, une absurdité, la mort esL l'apriori de la vie 7 le temps de la vie s'articule en laps de temps; et de même que les périodes enchaînées et les épisodes successifs se limitent l'un l'autre dans le grand temps de la vie, de même ce grand temps à son tour, ce Temps de tous les temps, resserré entre naissance et mort apparaît comme un épisode dans l'éternité du néant. Les deux néants qui l'étreignent le néant d'avant le commencement et le néant d'après la fin, fond du grand temps une durée véritable, charpentée, structurée, où à l'infini s'articulent entre eux les petits temps segmentaires

Mais la vie, pour le vivant, esL ce qu'elle esL, ni brève, ni longue. La vie s'affirme malgré, Connaît, en dépit de la mort, en étant vivante que parce que vouée à la mort. Le parce que et le bien que de la mort expriment la finitude, la corporalité et la temporalité de l'être. Le tragique de l'impossible-nécessaire esL exprimé par la symbiose des impossibles. « L'impossible-nécessaire ne se confond ni avec le tragique simple de la répugnance réciproque, ni avec la situation irréciproque où l'un cherche l'autre qui le fuit (...) le destin de ces deux corrélats est en effet de ne jamais réussir à se rejoindre » (Idem 7 107). La vie et la mort ne sont jamais données ensemble, ne sont jamais contemporaines, sauf dans le cas de l'enfance et présent par l'auteur en faisant référence à Tolsaï, où le paradoxe de l'impossible-nécessaire s'accomplit miraculeusement : « la mort de l'un (la mère) est immédiatement (et non pas à terme) la condition biologique de la naissance de l'autre ; et il périt ainsi dans l'affirmation de sa positivité la plus créatrice. » (Idem : 110) Un autre cas d'impossible-nécessaire est illustré par le rapport ambivalent entre l'esprit créateur et ses œuvres. Dans ce cas, l'être créateur ne s'annihile pas dans ses œuvres, mais le produit expire dans son produit :

Le mystère de la création n'est décevante ni avant dans le créateur, ni après coup, dans le fait accompli de la création : par nature, il peut être surpris dans l'insaisissable passage de celui-là à celui-ci (...) sur le moment, c'est l'espace d'un éclair, l'occasion opportune pourra s'offrir à nous de capter l'insolent et flagrant de la création.

Dans ce paragraphe du livre il s'agit de la mort continuée qui est une sorte de vie continue, sauvée au néant : « À l'infini l'être surgit du non-être, et à l'infini l'être s'annihile dans le non-être... Avènement continué d'un avenir. Le devenir est à tout instant la mouvante solution qui dégèle l'insoluble de l'impossibilité nécessaire » (Idem : 113). Grâce au modus vivendi du devenir, l'âme et le corps, ces deux « impossibles », seront assez bien adaptés l'un à l'autre, et grâce au temps, notre vie insupportable devient une vie miraculeusement vivable et qui se continue jusqu'au terme légal. Jankélévitch en étant un philosophe de l'action, il résout la réalité de l'impossible-nécessaire en dynamisme : « grâce au devenir, le tragique du désespoir sera tout simplement sérieux » (Idem : 115).

Les disjonctions dramatiques des choix (le choix d'une carrière, le choix d'une femme) en cours de l'existence, constituent notre contribution à l'alternative. Mais, pour ce qui est du grand choix, le destin a déjà choisi pour la créature. L'impossible-nécessaire est toujours présent si la créature ne peut pas éliminer les impossibles (être quelqu'un sans renoncer à être nous), « le destin a choisi pour elle, dès sa naissance, la détermination qui est négation » (Idem : 116).

La mort est l'organe-obscur de la vie sur tout dans un sens temporel. Dès sa naissance, l'homme est mort en sursis. Il est dit que la vie humaine est bornée entre les limites d'un laps de temps déterminé. « La fin de la vie, pour le vivant, est toujours future, et ceci jusqu'au dernier moment » (Idem : 120). Si l'on n'avait pas ce futur virtuellement présent, le présent éternel pure et simple se fonderait le vrai problème pour l'homme en étant de ne jamais mourir. La mort n'est pas l'obscur et relatif, mais « l'obstacle absolu qui scelle l'unicité ou sémelfactivité de l'existence en général et interdit à jamais la répétition de cette existence. » (Idem : 129) Il parle ici de l'irréversibilité du temps : « une jeunesse manquée est une jeunesse manquée, c'est entendu; car on n'est jeune qu'une seule fois dans sa vie, et la saison de la jeunesse ne peut d'aucune manière se répéter; mais il n'est pas impossible à celui qui a manqué sa jeunesse de réussir sa vieillesse » (Idem : 129-130). Mais par rapport à une vie perdue qui est irrémédiablement perdue, une jeunesse manquée est un échec partiel.

Par la suite, Jankélévitch nous parle de la quiddité du mystère de la mort en utilisant la métaphore de l'encre ouverte qui exprime la profonde ambiguïté de la mor¹ « ici la science sait vaguement que, tandis que la nescience ignore ce que. Telle est la science nesciente que nous appelons Entrevision » (Idem² 137). Le mystère ³ nsiste dans le fait que la mort ⁴ à moitié ⁵ a été elle est ⁶ certaine, mais son heure, bien que ⁷ certaine, est ⁸ ignorée, ⁹ ce qui veut dire que ¹⁰ toute heure peut être la dernière. « Pour n'être pas surpris par l'heure, il suffirait censément que le vivant ait de sa mortalité, non pas une connaissance notionnelle et banale, mais une expérience vivante et passionnelle. » (Idem² 143) ¹¹ et ¹² l'heure ¹³ certaine mais ignorée fait de l'homme un ¹⁴ pénel ¹⁵ condamné à ¹⁶ mort ¹⁷ jouissance ¹⁸ de ¹⁹ sursis ²⁰ indéfinis (Hugo, 1829). Mais la ²¹ confusion en sera dans ²² tous les ²³ cas la même, ²⁴ car ²⁵ toutes les durées finies s'annulent ²⁶ auprès de l'infini ²⁷ et ²⁸ de l'éternel néant.

Une autre alternative que l'auteur analyse est celle de la mort ²⁹ certaine et ³⁰ de l'heure ³¹ certaine qui est ³² aussi angoissante que l'heure ³³ incertaine. Victor Hugo décrit ³⁴ cette situation affolée de l'heure ³⁵ certaine dans Le dernier jour d'un condamné, Léonid Andreïev dans son Récit des sept pendus, Doszjovski lui consacre quelques pages dans son roman L'Idiot. Le temps de la vie devient ³⁶ insupportable ³⁷ et ³⁸ inhumain ³⁹ « le temps du condamné à mort, consommant des ressources limitées, a perdu son efficacité créatrice et son pouvoir d'innovation » (Jankélévitch, op.cit. 148). Dans ⁴⁰ ces cas, le futur est ⁴¹ lui-même du passé, ou il s'aplatit ⁴² dans un présent ⁴³ sans relief, manquant ⁴⁴ de perspective. L'homme arrive à une ⁴⁵ future ⁴⁶ congelée, à un ⁴⁷ de venir ⁴⁸ détemporalisé quand il a la ⁴⁹ présence ⁵⁰ de la mort ⁵¹ à ⁵² date ⁵³ fixe. « On comprend qu'en dissimulant à l'homme la prescience de l'heure, Prométhée lui ait épargné un supplice contre-nature (...) Prométhée nous concède, à la faveur de notre ignorance, une manière de futur illusoire » (Idem² 148).

L'auteur nous présente encore deux autres alternatives ⁵⁴ celle de la mort ⁵⁵ incertaine ⁵⁶ et ⁵⁷ de l'heure ⁵⁸ incertaine, ⁵⁹ et ⁶⁰ celle de la mort ⁶¹ certaine ⁶² et ⁶³ de l'heure ⁶⁴ incertaine. Dans ⁶⁵ tous ⁶⁶ ces cas, l'inévitable est ⁶⁷ la quoddié de la mort ⁶⁸ « Sans doute, la nécessité de mourir n'est-elle pas une nécessité logique ; ou réciproquement (ce qui revient au même) l'impossibilité de mourir n'est en rien, à son tour, une impossibilité logique » (Idem² 161). Si la ⁶⁹ résignation à la ⁷⁰ Quoddié représente la ⁷¹ moralité, la ⁷² douleur, la ⁷³ spatialité ⁷⁴ et ⁷⁵ la ⁷⁶ temporalité, qui est ⁷⁷ notre ⁷⁸ destin, la ⁷⁹ mort ⁸⁰ représente l'inconnaissable, l'impossible, l'incalculable, une ⁸¹ maladie ⁸² et ⁸³ une ⁸⁴ malheur.

En parlant ⁸⁵ des deux limites de la vie, la ⁸⁶ terminaison ⁸⁷ et ⁸⁸ le ⁸⁹ commencement ⁹⁰ Jankélévitch ⁹¹ décrit ⁹² la vie de l'infini, en la ⁹³ plaçant ⁹⁴ entre l'infini d'avant ⁹⁵ la naissance ⁹⁶ et ⁹⁷ l'infini d'après la mort ⁹⁸. Mais ⁹⁹ ce ¹⁰⁰ l'infini n'est ¹⁰¹ pas le même avec ¹⁰² ou ¹⁰³ sans ¹⁰⁴ ma vie. Le ¹⁰⁵ fait ¹⁰⁶ d'avoir ¹⁰⁷ été ¹⁰⁸ ne peut ¹⁰⁹ être ¹¹⁰ effacé, ¹¹¹ ce ¹¹² qu'on ¹¹³ ose ¹¹⁴ qui n'arrive qu'une seule fois dans ¹¹⁵ toute ¹¹⁶ l'éternité, vous, en ¹¹⁷ donnant ¹¹⁸ sa ¹¹⁹ couleur ¹²⁰ d'unicité ¹²¹ et ¹²² d'irrépétibilité ¹²³ à ¹²⁴ temps ¹²⁵ et ¹²⁶ de ¹²⁷ votre ¹²⁸ vie qui est ¹²⁹ une ¹³⁰ aventure.

On est ¹³¹ en ¹³² de voir dans le vieillissement ¹³³ les ¹³⁴ symptômes ¹³⁵ de la mort ¹³⁶. Or, si ¹³⁷ toute ¹³⁸ le monde ¹³⁹ sait ¹⁴⁰ qu'il va mourir, personne ne ¹⁴¹ le ¹⁴² croit ¹⁴³ vraiment ¹⁴⁴ ni même les vieillards.

Dans le cas du vieillard, l'impalpable je ne-sais-quoi de la temporalité se rend visible comme processus de notre être et est érisé. La vieillesse est la maladie de la temporalité, comme la mort est la maladie des bien-portants. Dans une autre perspective, la vie est une mort continue, l'usure progressive en faisant du devenir une vie mourante.

2. Dans la deuxième partie, Jankélévitch nous parle de la mort dans l'inséparable mort, c'est-à-dire la mort sur le moment « La compréhension de la mort en soi n'est concevable ni par la pensée et encore moins sous le mode de l'expérience. » (Lavoie, de Konink & Blondeau, op.cit. : 73) Dans cette partie du livre, plus forte que la première partie, l'auteur nous introduit dans la pudeur de l'inséparable inénarrable. Il s'agit sur l'axe du temps, de deux noms, la vie et la mort, et d'un verbe, mourir, qui est un faire, inatteignable à la compréhension humaine. « Ma naissance et ma mort ne peuvent être pour moi des objets de pensée. (...) Je me sens voué à un flux de vie inépuisable dont je ne puis penser ni le commencement ni la fin, puisque c'est encore moi vivant que les pense. » (Merleau-Ponty, 1945 : 418) Le verbe mourir nous situe dans cette partie du livre sous l'aspect de la pensée de Jankélévitch. Pour lui, ce l'inséparable du mourir est une plénitude. Si pour Socrate mourir c'est guérir d'une maladie qui est la vie, car ses dernières paroles sont de payer le médecin, pour Jankélévitch ce qui compte c'est de s'otter de la vie qui précède l'inséparable de mourir.

L'inséparable mort n'est pas un changement qualitatif car la mort ressort de toutes les catégories, la réelle manifestation de la mort en restant un mystère total et inatteignable à la compréhension humaine. « La mutation-limite appelée mort n'est pas à l'échelle du langage. » (Idem : 232).

L'inséparable de la mort n'est pas une altération temporelle et il refuse toute topographie. « La mort, comme elle n'est pensable ni en termes de changement ni en termes de plus et de moins, (...) refuse de même toute chronologie et toute topographie. » (Idem : 244). Si la mort en-deçà est localisable, la mort dans l'inséparable d'après ou dans l'inséparable même n'est plus localisable, on perd la trace de l'être vivant. « Celui qui meurt quelque part émigre ensuite nulle part. La mort est un mouvement qui ne va nulle part comme elle est un devenir qui ne devient rien. » (Idem : 246)

L'inséparable mort n'a pas de relations car « le non-être légal, qui est le rien de tout notre être, exclut tout rapport ou communication avec une altérité » (Idem : 254). Jaspers dit que « les conceptions de l'état de mort sont vaines. Il ne nous parvient de l'au-delà pas la moindre expérience, pas le moindre signe. Personne n'en est revenu. C'est pourquoi certains disent: être mort ce n'être rien; la mort est le néant. » (Jaspers, 2006 : 130)

Dans la conception phédonienne, le seuil de la mort est amoral, Socrate ne confond nullement l'espérance et le courage, comme Jankélévitch ne confond non plus l'espérance et l'espoir. Tandis que l'espoir a un objet, l'espérance est sans objet.

La mort est analysée comme fluxion de petites morts, pour banaliser, minimiser et « économiser complètement l'instant de la mort » (Jankélévitch, op.cit. : 260). La mort n'est plus présente comme événement unique, mais comme un événement incessant qui intervient non pas à la fin de la vie, mais à chaque instant en cours de l'existence. « L'idée des innombrables morts microscopiques de la vie quotidienne est-elle autre chose qu'une métaphore ? » (Idem : 263) Non, car il n'y a pas de mort par étapes, mais la mort générale, totale, absolue, sans compléments sans autre précision.

Pour Jankélévitch, l'événement de la mort n'est pas un rien, mais un presque-rien : « Entre le rien de l'au-delà et le tout de l'en-deçà (...), le presque-rien n'est-il pas ce qui nous occupe ici ? Ce presque-rien est l'Instant, c'est-à-dire le fait même du passage et l'événement de ce passage. » (Idem : 271). La naissance et la mort introduisent dans l'existence de l'homme deux ruptures, en se présentant comme des instants ou comme ce que l'auteur appelle « presque-rien ». « La mort est un presque rien pour moi – mais là aussi ce Presque suffit... La mort est donc tout pour moi ! » (Idem : 273)

On n'apprend pas à mourir et « chacun est seul à mourir » (Ernst, 2010 : 43). Mais la mort ne s'apprend pas comme la vertu. On apprend à continuer, mais on n'apprend pas à commettre, comme on n'apprend non plus à mourir. Et en outre, on ne meurt qu'une fois, alors qu'est-ce qu'on peut en apprendre, à quoi s'apprend-issage peut-il servir ? Et comment se préparer à un événement absolument « inouï », « jamais vu, jamais vécu, à un instant dont personne n'a jamais eu la moindre idée ni ne peut réaliser d'avance la nature ? » (Jankélévitch, op.cit. : 275)

Il s'agit, dans l'instance de la mort, d'une soudaine et progressive, car si toutes les heures nous rongent la dernière nous-mêmes. L'homme ne finit pas par mourir à force de vieillir, « personne ne meurt à proprement parler de vieillesse » (Idem : 283). Pour en finir, il faut qu'on passe à la limite, sans ce passage le vieillissement durait jusqu'à la fin des siècles.

Dans le cas du mourir, ce processus est irréversible, il s'agit d'un aller et retour dans l'espace qui est un aller sans retour dans le temps. « Le presque-rien de l'instant mortel est le seuil de deux mondes. » (Idem : 286) Dans ce monde d'en-bas, il n'est pas possible de rajeunir, de revenir, de passer de vieillir, car le temps ne peut pas retourner sur ses pas, « le reflux des fleuves vers l'amont serait un miracle très ordinaire et à peine une féerie, comparé au reflux du temps vers les origines » (Idem : 293), les expériences ressemblent à l'endroit où on ne peut pas faire que ce qui a eu lieu n'ait pas eu lieu, le temps s'en va, et l'homme est incapable de nihiliser la temporalité du temps, la temporalité en général.

L'objétivité du temps est véritablement irréversible, le passé n'est pas un futur à l'envers et le futur n'est pas un passé à l'endroit le devenir en étant invincible, comme la mort. Si dans le temps toutes les choses sont possibles, le temps lui-même qui est le temps vide, lui est inexterminable. L'irréversibilité terminale de la mort ne peut pas être pensée. On ne peut que vivre en cours de continuation et de irréversibilité empirique qui est une irréversibilité relative. « Ce qui est désespérément impossible devient donc, grâce au souvenir, nostalgiquement impossible, c'est-à-dire idéalement possible (...) et le retour mnémique au passé peut compenser symboliquement l'irréversible. » (Idem : 298)

En cours de continuation, toutes les fois sont la première et la dernière fois, chaque instant en étant unique, toutes les fois sont primes-ultimes, sauf la naissance qui est la toute première des premières fois dans la série de toutes les séries, une fois sans passé, et la mort qui est la toute dernière des dernières fois, une fois sans futur. « Ainsi donc le commencement et la fin en cours de continuation ne sont pas seulement hors-série, mais encore intrasérielles. » (Idem : 303) Jankélévitch introduit ici, pour caractériser ce processus primitif relatif, le terme de semelfativité qui définit la sécularité et la pénultième, mais la première mortelle est absolue, elle marque l'apparition et la disparition de la mort : « la première fois mortelle n'instaure pas une nouvelle série, et elle est donc dernière; la dernière fois mortelle n'est pas l'aboutissement d'une série d'essais, et elle est donc première » (Idem / 314).

À la différence de la première et dernière fois de la naissance qui a lieu pour quelqu'un qui n'existe pas, la première et dernière fois de la mort arrive pour quelqu'un qui est une personne consciente : « un instant pour commencer, toute la vie ensuite pour en parler et pour épiloguer : tel est le futur de la toute première fois. Et voici maintenant le statut de la dernière : toute la vie pour attendre, dans l'angoisse, la consommation de l'intervalle – mais ensuite plus personne pour regarder en arrière par rétrospection » (Idem / 315). La dernière fois de la mort est donc plus rien à jamais. Si l'insuccès est dissymétrique parce qu'il n'a pas de passé et il annonce un immense avenir, l'insuccès est lui aussi dissymétrique, en étant une fuite sans futur, une absence sans autre. « Jamais plus est en effet la formule intemporelle du néant » (Idem / 322) car ce qu'annonce la dernière fois de la mort n'est pas seulement plus rien, mais plus jamais rien et plus rien à jamais !

L'irréversible de l'avoir-été est aussi valable pour l'irréparable du fait d'avoir-fait : « capable de faire, mais non de défaire le fait d'avoir-fait, l'homme est donc un demi-créateur » (Idem / 337). En présence de la mort, il est interdit à l'homme de jouer avec le temps, la mort en étant la condensation de l'irréversible-irréparable : « limite extrême, aiguë, absolue de la modification, la mort est irrévocable en sa quiddité comme tout autre accident du devenir » (Idem / 339). « Par là même l'irréversible-irréparable scelle et consacre le caractère irremplaçable, incomparable, inimitable du "Hapax" désormais disparu ». Pour notre auteur, la renaissance, la réincarnation et la réanimation ne sont pas possibles, le rien de la mort en étant le nihilisme absolu, qui se le irrévocablement l'impossibilité de retour à l'endroit. L'irréversible ne permet le passage que dans un sens, l'insuccès suprême de la mort n'est pas une limite : « l'instant de la mort est le point d'intersection de deux contradictoires, qu'il faut bien appeler être et non-être » (Idem / 354), l'insuccès de la mort est un insuccès nihiliste, dans lequel c'est la disparition qui prévaut.

La dernière fois ne relève d'ailleurs de la lumière éternelle, Jankélévitch en étant une philosophie qui aimait la vie, et non pas des ténèbres lumineuses :

la lumière est réfléchi sur l'endroit par le dernier insuccès; le dernier insuccès n'est donc pas la vitre transparente à travers laquelle nous verrions les paysages d'outre-monde et la face réfléchi de notre destin, mais plutôt le miroir qui renvoie à notre ténèbres sa propre image ; en aucun cas l'irréversible ne laisse repasser dans cette vie la lumière de l'autre vie... si ce n'est qu'une seule lumière existe

(Idem / 368)

La surnaturalité absolue de la mort est garantie par l'irréversible du dernier insuccès qui se le l'absence de l'absent qui sera non point temporelle, mais éternelle.

3. La troisième partie est réservée à la mort au-delà de la mort. Dans cette partie, il ne parle plus en termes de verbe, mais de nom. Il essaie de voir qu'est-ce qui arrive à l'être après la mor. Le fait qu'on sait qu'on va mourir un jour ne nous apprend rien ni de la mort en elle-même, ni de la mort au-delà de la mort. Tout le monde sait qu'il va mourir, mais personne ne le croit vraiment. La mort ne se présente jamais pour moi en première personne. Il y a deux choses distinctes qui sont aussi opposées : savoir et réaliser. Il y a deux choses différentes que d'être mortel et d'être destiné soi-même à mourir, car la connaissance générale que je puisse avoir de la mort est la connaissance par laquelle je suis moi-même condamné, n'est jamais réalisée en première personne. » (Idem : 372). « Ma mort à moi n'est donc pas la mort de quelqu'un, mais elle est la mort qui bouleverse le monde, une mort inimitable, unique en son genre et à nulle autre pareil. » (Idem : 25)

Devant l'au-delà de la mort, ni la palingénèse, ni le panbioïsme ne sont possibles, car l'au-delà n'est pas un avenir, ce qui nous donne la phobie de l'insaisissable, l'angoisse de l'insaisissable et la peur de l'au-delà. « Ainsi s'opposent en chaque homme l'angoisse de mourir et la terreur d'être mort. » (Idem : 377) Mais Jankélévitch nous dit que l'homme est pris entre l'espoir et l'opprobre désespéré : « l'au-delà, lui, n'étant rien de rationnel, est désespérément soigné plutôt que passionnément persécuté » (Idem : 381). On espère en l'au-delà être en première personne la victoire sur la mort : « cette mort qui est toujours évitable et pourtant inévitable; cette mort qui n'est jamais nécessaire à tel ou tel moment et qui est pourtant nécessaire en général » (Idem : 382). Mais comme nous aurons refusé l'anéantissement et il est un adieu de l'espérance. Cependant, il est l'absence de l'absurdité de la survie, de l'immortalité de la résurrection et de la vie perpétuelle. « L'ambiguïté infinie de l'au-delà tient toute dans ce fait que les deux solutions contradictoires de la « survie » et de la nihilisation sont également absurdes : il nous faut dégager tour à tour ces deux absurdités avant de les voir coïncider irrationnellement dans un même mystère » (Idem : 384). Le grand opus de la survie a fait naître dans l'imagination de l'homme toute sorte de chimères, pour combler le vœu d'immortalité de l'homme : l'espoir philanthropique de ne jamais mourir (le vivant en restant en-dehors de la vie propre, il n'a pas besoin d'une survie, rallonge esthologique de sa vie), l'espérance en ce que les immortels appellent en général survie (résurrection miraculeuse puisque le vivant en fait se réveille de la mort). Les allégations sur la pérennité de la vie et l'éternité de l'essence, ne sont que des consolations, tandis que la survie personnelle de l'âme est plutôt une espérance. « Le vivant est mortel, mais la vie de ce vivant et la vitalité de cette vie sont inexterminables et incorruptibles ; et par conséquent la mort n'est pas la fin de la vie, mais seulement la fin du vivant: la mort clorait la carrière individuelle, mais non la vie universelle. » (Idem : 387) La mort, dans cette vision, n'a plus rien de tragique. Il s'agit de l'éternité de l'essence pensante, représentée par la conscience : « la pensée qui pense la mort s'offre-t-elle à nous comme un second moyen d'en dissiper le tragisme » (Idem : 393).

Le dualisme de l'âme et du corps nous permet d'expliquer la survie, car ce qui individualise l'individu est l'âme et non la vie : ce qui rend notre propre anéantissement impossible à comprendre est le principe de continuité. On voit l'absurdité de la nihilisation, la condamnation en allant de soi et la cessation en conséquence d'un scandale. Le roi (Ionesco, 1998 : 65) qui se meurt se demande : « Pourquoi suis-je né, si ce n'était pas pour toujours ? »

La mort prend une forme particulière quand on envisage le cas de l'être pensant : « tout meurt, sauf la pensée qui pense la mort, et qui ne meurt point... Non, la conscience de mourir ne meurt pas ! Non, la mort ne concerne pas la surconscience transcendante, la surconscience englobante qui la prend pour objet ou problème » (Jankélévitch, op.cit. : 410). Si la mort de l'être pensant est un fait, la pensée de la mort de l'être pensant est immortelle, car les vérités ne vieillissent pas, la permanence intemporelle des vérités car dérisoire aussi la pensée qui les pense : « l'être pensant, immortel en tant qu'il est pensant, mortel en tant qu'il est un être, est finalement mortel » (Idem : 418).

Dans tous les cas, on ne peut finalement parler que du triomphe de la mort de celle-ci sur la mort elle-même. Le dernier mot appartiendra en fait non pas à la pensée, mais à la mort qui ne peut être surmontée physiquement par la pensée : « La pensée prend conscience de la mort jusqu'à l'avant-dernier instant inclusivement ; mais à l'instant suprême l'être pensant meurt, et la pensée, du même coup, cesse de penser; après avoir pensé la mort toute sa vie, le penseur meurt lui-même un beau jour à l'appel de son nom. » (Idem : 421) En vérité, la mort est plus forte que la pensée. C'est elle qui procède en nous contre le scandale de l'anéantissement qui métaphoriquement s'enrichit victorieusement à la mort d'esprit d'amour, c'est aussi la liberté et Dieu. Comme dit Ionesco, « si tu as l'amour fou, si tu aimes insensément, si tu aimes absolument, la mort s'éloigne » (Ionesco, op.cit. : 112). L'amour dit non au non de la mort et à la liberté, à son tour, est une proclamation contre l'anéantissement scandaleux et imprévisible et dérisoire. L'amour, la liberté et Dieu sont pour nous au cœur « des garanties d'immortalité ; des assurances contre le non-être » (Jankélévitch, op.cit. : 434). Jankélévitch, à la fin du livre, dit qu'on trouve le gage d'une existence impérissable « dans la vie elle-même, dans la joie de vivre et dans la surnaturalité de la naturalité vécue » (Idem : 453), car il faut beau vivre.

ABSTRACT: According to Bloom's literary canon, one of the three aesthetic principles is the anxiety of influences, namely the original or wrong interpretation of classical great literary works. Postmodern poetics responds to this idea, in the sense that it reininterprets the previous literature, often resorting to pastiche, intertext and ludic elements and oral character. The present paper aims at analyzing the manner in which Rui Zink, voluntarily, interprets in a wrong manner the classical epic genre and what are the postmodern elements he resorts to in order to accomplish his task.

According to Bloom's literary canon, any literary work is based on three aesthetic principles: the strangeness of ideas, the anxiety of ideas and the anxiety of influences. The first principle refers to the originality of a literary work, the second one points to the fact that any literary work must somehow trouble the readers, whereas the third principle refers to the manner in which a literary work is created. According to Bloom, any writer is consciously influenced by the literary works of the previous great writers and any new valuable literary work must consist in the original or wrong interpretation of classical great literary works: "Any important literary work is a creative-wrong reading and a wrong interpretation of a classical text or of several such texts" (Bloom, 1995: 11).

Postmodern poetics is connected to bloomian concept of error in the sense that it reininterprets the previous literature, often resorting to pastiche, intertext and ludic elements. There is a paradox at the very heart of postmodernism: it both "enshrines the past" and "questions it", it marks both a difference from the past and a connection with it by means of intertextuality (Hutcheon, 2004: 125-126). The world of the postmodern text is "a world of discourse, the world of texts and in texts" and postmodernism itself is "a theoretical exploration of the vast dialogue between and among literatures and histories" (Hutcheon, 2004: 125).

Within and behind any given text there is a plurality of other texts (Krisjeva, 1969: 72).

We are going to analyze the manner in which Rui Zink, voluntarily, interprets in a wrong manner the classical epic genre and what are the postmodern elements he resorts to in order to accomplish his task.

Theme:

The theme of reading is a postmodern theme along with the themes of daily life, commuting, ordinary urban experiences, hotels, etc. The novel is a meditation on the act of reading nowadays.

Pastiche- Hypertextuality:

The novel O Anibaleitor can be considered a pastiche as it is a take on Moby Dick by Hermann Melville and on Lewis Carroll's The Hunting of the Snark. It is very important to mention the fact that these two sources of imitation are named by Rui Zink himself at the end of the novel, in Author's Note.

In G. Genette's terms, the novel O Anibaleitor is a hyperlexor or a B-type lexor whereas the two texts Moby Dick and The Hunting of the Snark are hypolexors or A-type texts, namely earlier texts upon which other texts are grafted: "Hyperlexuality refers to any relationship uniting a text B (which I shall call the hyperlexor) to an earlier text A (I shall, of course, call it the hypotext), upon which it is grafted in a manner that is not that of commentary." (Genette, 1997: 5). This process is called transformation and can be rendered graphically as follows:

A (hypotext) → B (hyperlexor)

Hyperlexor derives from hypolexor without mentioning it. It is only in Author's Note that Rui Zink mentions these two references.

Discussing about Moby Dick (1851) by Hermann Melville, Rui Zink shows that the name of the character Queequeg is taken from here, too. To make the reference even more visible, Zink's character has lost one leg because "it was ripped off by a whalwhale" (p. 20) and he also has "a story about a whalwhale whood on his body" (p. 20). Mention should be made of other similarities, too:

- as Rui Zink's novel is mainly based on two characters, the child narrator and the monster Anibareader, Melville's novel is structured around the two main characters, Ahab and Ishmael, who are contrasted with each other, with Ishmael the observer and narrator;

- Moby Dick can be read as a "narrative of education" (Milder, 1988: 434) and so can be read O Anibaleitor. The former refers to education referring to rather practical issues, whereas the latter is an education in the art of reading;

- Ahab, the Captain in Moby Dick, is a "force of linearity" (Bryan & Springer, 2007: xvi) and so is the Captain in Zink's novel: "He had the annoying habit of believing that he is never wrong and of having only seldom doubts" (pp. 20-21);

- Both the child narrator in Zink's novel, on the one hand, and the main characters in Melville's novel, have a whole in their hearts and feel they are somehow incomplete beings. Thus, the child narrator's parents are preparing to divorce and both Ahab and Ishmael are orphans.

Anibareader is similar to Snark – an imaginary animal created by Lewis Carroll in the absurd poem The Hunting of the Snark. The story goes like this: A crew made up of ten people set sail to hunt the Snark. They are guided by the leader Bellman, who uses a map which is, in fact, a blank sheet of paper. (In Rui Zink's novel, the Captain uses a map, too, but his one is said to be made of human skin. (p. 28): "It is said that in order to make this map, a brave sailor used his own skin, scratching it with a sharp stone" (p. 29). The crew are told that some Snarks are dangerous Boojums and that if the Snark is a Boojum, then the hunter vanishes away. They split up to hunt the Snark. In the end of the poem, the Baker tries that he has found the Snark but when his shipmates arrive, he has disappeared. The narrator concludes that the Snark was a Boojum.

At the same time, mention should be made of the fact that the manner in which Rui Zink coins the word that gives the name of the monster is an imitation of the Romanian words in D. Arol's The Hunting of the Snark, a swearing going to demonstrate further on.

Other textualist elements:

Rui Zink, in The Author's Note, gives a definition of intertext: "a text can hide another text. Even unwillingly, a book is always engaged in a dialogue with other books" (p. 105).

Textualist references can be seen in Author's Note: "Now, the texture of these details deliberately interweaves with other textures. Here are some of the most shameless references..." (p. 105). Zink also mentions (apart from Moby Dick (1851) by Hermann Melville and The Hunting of the Snark (1876)) Kong by Merian Cooper; Dune (1985), a song; Esteiros (1941) by Soeiro Pereira Gomes; Aventuras Maravilhosas de João Sem Medo (1963) by José Gomes Ferreira; Dinosauro Excelentíssimo (1972) by José Cardoso Pires; O Malhadinhas (1922) by Aquilino Ribeiro; O labirintodonte (1970), a poem and a book by Alberto Simões; A Reinvenção da Leitura (1975) by Ana Hatherly, a visual poem. He also indicates that in Canto V in Lusiada there is "a Vaking Cliff", but its name is Adamastor. (In O Anibaleitor the monster appears to the child narrator as a cliff, at the beginning: "One of the walls of the cave has a huge hunched back, a black, prominent cliff. The cliff moved" – p. 39) and that there is also "a certain Dr. Hannibal Lecter," "the main character of three novels by Thomas Harris, among which The Silence of the Lambs (1988)" (p. 107).

Rui Zink makes use of ample intertext in a wide variety of forms:

- authors mentioned in the novel: Garret (p. 49); Aquilino (p. 56); Saramago (p. 75); Fernando Pessoa (p. 75); Borges (p. 79); Jorge Luis Borges (p. 105).

- books mentioned in the novel: 1001 Nights (p. 55); The Three Musketeers (p. 56); The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (p. 56); The Karamazov Brothers (p. 56); Crime and Punishment (p. 56); The Town and the Mountain (p. 56).

- books mentioned in Author's Note that are written by Rui Zink himself: The Waiting (2007) and O Suplente; Lusitano Hotel (1986); Apocalypse Nau (1996);

- authors and books mentioned in the novel: King Solomon's The Song of Songs (p. 19); Rubem Fonseca's And from the Middle of the Prostitute World I've Kept Love Only for Cigar (Do Meio do Mundo Prostituto Só Amores Guardei ao Meu Charuto) (p. 55); Jules Verne's Around the World In Eighty Days (pp. 55-56); Julio Cortázar's Around the Day in Eighty Worlds (p. 56); Guimarães Rosa's The Devil to Pay in the Backlands (Grande Sertão: Veredas) (p. 66); Proust's In Search of Lost Time (p. 67); Tolstoy's War and Peace, Anna Karenina (p. 67); Virginia Woolf's Orlando (p. 74);

- books mentioned in the novel but whose writers are revealed by the author himself later on, in the Author's Note; they are not mentioned in the text: O Dinosaurio Excelentíssimo, by José Cardoso Pires (p. 56); Aventuras Maravilhosas de João Sem Medo, by José Gomes Ferreira (p. 56); Esteiros, by Sociro Pereira Gomes (p. 56); O Malhadinhas, by Aquilino Ribeiro (p. 56).

- quotations without mentioning the author or the book: p. 49; p. 82.

- quotations mentioning the author: Borge (p. 40) and (pp. 79-80); Álvaro de Campos (Fernando Pessoa's heteronym) (p. 50); Luís Vaz de Camões (p. 62); Augusto Monterroso (p. 68).

- references without mentioning the author or the book and later on revealed by one of the characters or by the author himself:

- Anibareader asks the child narrator: "Are you willing to exchange some ideas with me on a theme?" (p. 54) and, later on (p. 55), the child reveals the title of the book, We'd Better Exchange Some Ideas on This Theme, as well as the name of the author, Mário de Carvalho;

- we find out that the visual poem on p. 73 is written by Ana Hatherly and belongs to A Reinvenção da Leitura (1975), a fact which is revealed by the author himself in Author's Note;

- on page 26, the child asks: "Hey, Quequeg, isn't this similar to the hunting of the Snark?". Later on, in Author's Note, Zink himself reveals the source of imitation: Lewis Carroll's The Hunting of the Snark;

- on page 34, the child says: "Then, if we should to me across this Animal Horror...", clearly making a confusion of name. Later on, in Author's Note, Zink himself reveals the source of imitation: "The main character of three novels by Thomas Harris, among which The Silence of the Lambs (1988)" (p. 107): Dr. Hannibal Lecter.

- references without mentioning the author or the book and never revealed afterwards:

- "I must learn that, according to some people, the world was contained in a mere letter" (p. 60). – The readers infer that it is a reference to Borges;

- The story about the stone soup (p. 102), which ends the novel, can be read as a reference to The Bible: "The stone that the builders rejected has become the cornerstone; this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes?"

- "I had had the luck to embark on a ship of fools" (p. 19) – There is a hint to Katherine Anne Porter's Ship of Fools.

- The name of the monster (Anibaleior, in Portuguese) points to the main character of three novels written by Thomas Harris (out of which The Silence of the Lambs is the most famous), namely Hannibal Lecter;

- It is very interesting to note the manner in which Rui Zink coins the word giving the name of the monster:

"So, Animal Reader wants to say only that..."

"Animal Reader, that is Reader, added the Captain. Only that it is a hairy brute that reads." (p. 33)

In Portuguese, the name of the hundred monster is Anibaleior (animal → anibal + leior) which can easily be translated into Romanian as Anibaleior (animal → anibal + leior), keeping the pun obtained by fusing the meanings of two different words. In English, joining "animal" and "reader" we obtain Anibareader. The name of the monster was taken from a map and the one who wrote it used "b" instead of "m" throughout the entire text, thus a humorous effect being obtained. The author obtains a humorous effect replacing the right letters with others:

m → b (animal → anibal)
f → p (awful → awpul)
m → b (main → bain)
q → g (quality → guality)
r → g (reading → geading)

This manner of building portmanteau words is an imitation from Lewis Carroll's The Hunting of the Snark. There, in the Preface, Carroll explains how such words are formed: "This also seems a fitting occasion to notice the other hard works in the poem. Humpy-Dumpy's theory, of two meanings packed into one word like a portmanteau, seems to me the right explanation for all. For instance, take the two words "fuming" and "furious." Make up your mind that you will say both words, but leave undecided which you will say first. Now open your mouth and speak. If your thought's line ever so little towards "fuming," you will say "fuming-furious;" if they turn, by even a hair's breadth, towards "furious," you will say "furious-fuming;" but if you have the rarest of gifts, a perfectly balanced mind, you will say "frumious." Supposing that when Pistol uttered the well-known words-- Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die!"

Just as Shallow had felt certain that it was either William or Richard, but had not been able to see the which, so she could not possibly say either name before the other, for an illbe doubted that rather than die, he would have gasped out "Richard!"¹¹

Comic elements:

Here are a few examples of comic elements in Zafon's novel: "Today's youth is extremely damaged to the head" (p. 16); "I (because of the age, I suppose) was rather on the moon than on the crow's nest" (p. 25); "Poison... I don't like the idea, either. What the hell, we would have used Chloroform if it had already been invented" (p. 34); "Come on, get on the crow's nest, otherwise I risk a rebellion of the crew for preferential treatment given to a Landeslir" (p. 35); "Had I been older, I would have collapsed right here, and had every instant struck en by a patient (and somehow humiliating) heart attack" (p. 40);

In Author's Note, discussing about the reference Kong by Merian D. Cooper, Zink concludes humorously: "Unfortunately, its creators (...) have died, therefore (to my great regret) I can't sue them" (p. 106).

Oral characteristics:

- the large use of dialogue: the second part of the novel, The Island, is mostly dialogue between the child narrator and the monster Anibareador;
- the use of interjections: "Oops, they have found me" (p. 14); "Shh, little boy!" (p. 24); "Aha." (p. 29); "Oops!" (p. 29); "Hey, Quecuog, isn't this similar to the hunting of the Snark?" (p. 26); "Ahh! I wanted to scream but the sound goes back in my neck" (p. 39); "Ahhhhhhhhh!" (p. 40); "Well..." (p. 42); "Oh! That is an entirely different thing" (p. 44); "Ho!Ho!" (p. 44);
- specific features of oral character: "as the saying goes" (p. 25)
- proverbs and sayings: "People say that behind a big fortune there is a big deficit" (p. 9); "Like the gardener's dog, that neither eats cabbages himself, nor lets anybody else" (p. 26);
- folk verses or rhythmic sentences: (p. 12); "Here comes the ship and the rind which has plenty to narrate. Now, listen, my lords, a bewildering story" (p. 17); "Little monkey, little monkey, climb up, don't be afraid! Hit yourself in the chest, like a birdie!" (p. 18);
- unexpected combinations of words: "happy panic attack" (p. 10); "small trouble – big trouble" (p. 11);
- repeated words/sounds or pauses (there are cases when both are used together): "S-s-skin?" (p.28); "Human s-s-skin?" (p. 28); "I-is it really true?" (p. 29); "W-what?" (p. 40); "W-who are you?" (p. 40); "Y-yes, I murdered very slowly" (p. 43); "Se-seven-teen" (p. 43); "A-are you... Are you Anibareador?" (p. 42); "No... no" (p. 41); "But... poison?" (p. 34); "But..." (p. 33); "A-are you really talking?" (p. 42); "As regards the reading... it would be absurd" (p. 33); "So, Anibareador wants to say only that..." (p. 33); "Is this... Is this old Portuguese?" (p. 31); "And... can you talk?" (p. 42); "Are you... you God?" (p. 44).

Conclusions

At the end of this brief analyze of the postmodern elements used by Rui Zink in order to interpret in a wrong manner the classical epic genre, we can conclude the following:

- he imitates the content of another famous literary work, namely Moby Dick by Herman Melville and Lewis Carroll's The Hunting of the Snark, lending a humorous tone to the novel;
- he creates the monster character imitating Lewis Carroll's monster character, namely Snark, which appears in The Hunting of the Snark;
- he makes use of quotations to a large extent;
- he employs bookish references (namely quotations without mentioning the author or the books and references without mentioning the author or the book and never revealed afterwards: "I must learn that, according to some people, the world was contained in a mere letter" – p. 60);
- he uses lexical references which appear in Author's Note;
- he explores the imaginary realm by creating the Anibareader monster;
- he uses many ludic elements;
- regarding the oral character of the novel, mention can be made of the large use of dialogue (the second part of the novel, The Island, is mostly a dialogue between the child narrator and the monster Anibareader); the use of interjections, specific features of oral character, proverbs and sayings, folk verses or rhythmic sentences, unexpected combinations of words, repeated words/sounds or pauses.

NOTE

- ¹ Mention should be made of the fact that Lewis Carroll borrows in The Hunting of the Snark eight portmanteau words from his earlier poem Jabberwocky (which is found in his children's novel Through the Looking Glass: bandersnatch, beamish, frumious, galumphing, jubjub, mimsiest (which previously appeared as mimsy in "Jabberwocky"), outgrabe and uffish). Therefore, it could be said that Rui Zink's imitation is an imitation loan imitation, or a second degree imitation.

Siblings in George Eliot*

Ruxandra DIACONU
University of Craiova (Romania)
Faculty of Letters

ABSTRACT

The present paper focuses on the relationship between siblings in three novels written by George Eliot, the pen name of the British author Mary Ann Evans. The novels in question include the author's first work, Adam Bede, published in 1859, her third and shortest novel, Silas Marner, published in 1861, and Middlemarch, the author's sixth and most complex novel, published in 1872.

In each of these novels, one of the main characters has a sibling of the same sex. Through comparisons and parallels, George Eliot foregrounds the main character and uses the siblings' relationship in order to emphasize his or her features. Sometimes Eliot openly sets the siblings in contrast and proves that one of them is superior to the other in certain aspects, but this does not always lead to the happiness of the one endowed with higher virtues.

Through an analysis of the relationships between Adam and Seth (Adam Bede), Godfrey and Dunsen (Silas Marner) and Dorothea and Delia (Middlemarch), we will prove that the author employs the comparisons between the siblings as a narrative device in order to present the main character. The paper argues that the author shapes a better and more encompassing representation of the main character, through the means of comparisons and contrasts between the siblings, using the siblings' relationship as an ingenious narrative device.

1. Introduction

George Eliot is the pen name of Mary Ann Evans (1819-1880), one of the main English Victorian writers. She was born in Warwickshire and she died in London. She chose a male penname because she considered that novels written by women were not taken seriously. In the Victorian Age, women had very well-shaped roles which they could not transgress. Marriage represented maturity and stability, and motherhood meant the confirmation of virtue and fulfillment. George Eliot chose to live with a divorced man, whose name was George Henry Lewes, and she did not have any children of her own, even though she raised his. She wanted to avoid the stereotypes of her times, but not necessarily to direct her efforts towards fighting against them; this is why she chose to hide from the audience the detail that she was writing novels.

This paper will focus on the relation between siblings in three of her novels: Adam Bede, Silas Marner, and Middlemarch. The author's first novel, Adam Bede, was published in 1859. A few two years, in 1861, her third and shortest novel, Silas Marner, was published. Middlemarch, the author's sixth novel begun in 1869, was published in serial form in 1871-1872 and is remarkable through its complexity conferred by its multiple plots. All of these novels have more than one main character, and in each novel one of the main characters has a sibling of the same sex. The argument of the present paper is the idea that George Eliot employs the sibling relations as a means to foreground the main character (which is one of the two siblings). The other sibling becomes a narrative tool which serves a term of comparison in order to emphasize the features of the main character.

Through comparisons and parallels, George Eliot foregrounds the main character and makes use of the siblings' relationship in order to emphasize his or her features. Sometimes George Eliot openly sets the siblings in contrast and proves that one of them is superior to the other in certain aspects, but this does not always lead to the happiness of the one endowed with higher virtues, as this paper will show in the section that focuses on Dorothea and Elia in Middlemarch. The author mainly uses the comparisons between the siblings as a narrative device in order to present the main character. When depicting Godfrey and Dunsen in the novel Silas Marner, George Eliot explicitly contrasts the two brothers and describes Dunsen as Godfrey's inferior in various aspects, as presented in the second section of this paper. The present work will focus on how George Eliot uses the siblings' relationship as an ingenious narrative device that leads to a better and more encompassing representation of the main character.

2. Adam and Seth Bede

Adam Bede is the main character of the novel with the same name. He and his brother, Seth Bede, are introduced in the first chapter of the novel where they are presented at work, in the workshop of "Mr Jonathan Burge, Carpenter and builder" (Adam Bede, Eliot [1997] 2003: 3). First the narrator describes Adam as a strong well-built man whose face expressed intelligence and honesty. Then Seth is described in a shorter paragraph introduced by the words: "It is clear at a glance that the next workman is Adam's brother." (Eliot 2003: 4) The brothers look similar at a first glance, but their features differ slightly: "the strength of the family likeness seems only to render more conspicuous the remarkable difference of expression both in form and face." (Eliot 2003: 4) Adam and Seth are similar but not alike and, as the present paper will show, this will lead to many instances in the novel when Adam is foregrounded through comparisons with his brother and his thoughts and ideas are disclosed through descriptions of his attitudes towards Seth.

James, quoted in Haigh, considers Adam and Seth to be "the strongest, purest, most disinterested of young rustics" (1965: 45). Indeed, in terms of morality and conduct towards the others, the Bede brothers are among the best pairs of siblings in George Eliot's novels. Both of them are well-intentioned and caring, they have a strong sense of duty and morality.

The fourth chapter of the novel, named Home and its Sorrows, introduces the reader to Adam and Seth's family life and presents the similarities of the two brothers reflected in the grief for their father's death as well as the distinction between them manifested in their thoughts on Thias Bede's death. Both Adam and Seth are very affected by their father's death; however their feelings are different "When they had [the body] on the bank, the two sons in the first moments knelt and looked with much awe at the glazed eyes, forging that there was need for action – forging everything but that their father lay dead before them." (Eliot 2003: 44) When they undertake the deed of carrying their father's dead body home, they lift "the sad burden in hearts that are silent." (Eliot 2003: 45) The powerful grief makes the two brothers more alike in their suffering.

When the narrator goes in more detail about their reactions at their father's death, then the differences between Adam and Seth are more emphasized. "Seth's chief feeling was awe and distress at his sudden snatching away of his father's soul; but Adam's mind rushed back over the past in a flood of relenting and pity." (Eliot 2003: 45) Thias was not without some humanly flaws: sometimes he drank too much, other times he was not punctual in his work. Adam always displayed severity towards his father's weaknesses and now he is repenting of his severity. "The death and funeral of Thias Bede bring remorse to Adam for the severity of his criticism." (Pinion 1981: 93)

Adam's repentance is foregrounded through the parallel between his feelings and Seth's. Both brothers suffer at the death of their father, but Adam also repents, because he was more severe than Seth. His severity comes from righteousness and sense of duty, which Adam possesses in a higher degree than others; as the reader concludes from the comparison between Adam and his brother. Beyers, quoted in Pangallo, observes that Adam's "suffering is the result of his unimaginative rigidity" (1994: 45) Adam manifests his rigidity not only towards his father, but also towards Hetty Sorrel, even though he loves her so much. He disapproves of Hetty when he gives her a rose and she sticks it in her hair. "The tender admiration in Adam's face was slightly shadowed by reluctant disapproval." Adam disliked "Hetty's love of finery [...] as much as it was possible for him to dislike anything that belonged to her." (Eliot 2003: 192) After his open criticism of his father, this is another instance when Adam expresses his severity towards the ways of somebody whom he holds very close to his heart.

In chapter fifty-one, Lisbeth Bede, the brothers' mother, voices her thoughts that it would be better for Dinah Morris and Adam if they got married. She tells this to Seth, who is surprised. She also mentions that somebody must tell Adam that Dinah is "fond of him"; otherwise he would never realize that "His mother's suggestion about Dinah's feelings towards Adam was not quite a new thought to Seth, but her last words alarmed him, lest she should herself undertake to open Adam's eyes. He was no sure about Dinah's feeling, and he thought he was sure about Adam's." (Eliott 2003: 426) When Seth tries to persuade his mother not to tell Adam what she thinks about Dinah, Lisbeth observes that "These things so cause she wouldna ha' thee", which makes Seth feel hurt (Eliott 2003: 426-427) Lisbeth is certain that Adam is in love with Dinah, but he does not realize this "happen he knowsna as he wants to see her; he knowsna as I pursue in's brother, but he'd miss it pretty quick if it warn a there." (Eliott 2003: 427) Dallas, quoted in Pangallo, considers this remark of Lisbeth to be "very homely" (1994: 41). Lisbeth is fond of both her sons, but in this particular occasion her insistence on Dinah marrying Adam seems to corroborate with her own wish to have Dinah close by her side as a daughter and to disregard Seth's hypothetical hard feelings towards the marriage between the woman whom he loved and who rejected him and his brother.

Goode, quoted in Hardy, observes that the death of Thias Bede is an "undergone of change" in the novel. (1970: 23) It is the first time that Adam repents for his severity. Later in the novel he also criticizes Henry, as it was shown before, but the sorrows he experiences at a change upon his critical attitude in the end of the novel. This change in Adam's ways is presented by the narrator through another instance of interaction between him and Seth. The fifth chapter describes the brothers "so like each other in the midst of their unlikeness." (Eliott 2003: 418) When Seth is lost in thoughts and daydreams, Adam watches him "with a kind smile dawning in his eyes" because he "had been getting more and more indulgent to Seth. It was part of the growing tenderness which came from the sorrow and work in him." (Eliott 2003: 419) Seth is here a mere narrative tool, he is only a person close to Adam's heart that the narrator needs in order to depict Adam's growing feeling of indulgence towards the ones he loves. It is this progress in Adam's critical nature and his softening caused by the sorrow he felt that makes him a better person, worthy of marrying Dinah in the end of the novel.

The relationship between Adam, Seth and Dinah turns out to be somehow problematic in the end of the novel, when she marries Adam, after she had refused Seth's proposals and had claimed that she would never choose to marry anyone. Adam held different religious beliefs; moreover, he had desperately loved the vain and superficial Henry Sorrel. In this context, his powerful attachment to Henry can be considered a proof of his youthful, even silly passions; whereas his marriage to Dinah represents Adam's maturity even elevation to a higher level, and ability to choose a reliable person for a life-long partnership. Here Seth plays the part of the good, meek, and understanding nature because he is not resentful in any way towards his brother and Dinah. According to George Eliott quoted in Pinion, "Dinah's ultimate relation to Adam was suggested by George [...] he wanted her to be the principal figure at the last" (1981: 93) Here she talks about George Henry Lewes whom she lived with and whom she considered her husband, even though he was married to Agnes Jervis. Thus, the writer admits that the marriage between Adam Bede and Dinah Morris was not initially her idea and maybe this is the reason for which this episode seems not to fit perfectly in the context of the plot.

The first encounter between Adam and Dinah is described in Chapter eleven and presents the mixed feelings they have for each other. Adam is in his workshop and hears somebody else in the kitchen. Unaware of Dinah's presence in the house, he hopes that the person in the kitchen is Healy, even though he admits that this is very unlikely, and a "very foolish thought" (Eliot 2003: 99). When Adam sees Dinah, he feels "like dreaming of the sunshine and awaking in the moonlight" (Eliot 2003: 99). He had never really noticed Dinah before, first because he had only seen her when Healy was around and all his attention was directed to Healy, and second because he was aware that Seth was in love with her. Thus, when Adam saw Dinah in his workshop, she "impressed him with all the force that belongs to a reality contrasted with a preoccupying fancy" (Eliot 2003: 99). Through the contrast between Dinah and Healy, the narrator underlines the difference between seeming and being, essence and reality. Healy is "a preoccupying fancy", something that occupies Adam's mind for the moment but should not stay in his thoughts for too long; whereas Dinah is the stable, powerful, reliable reality.

On the other hand, Dinah is also affected by her encounter with Adam. "Dinah, for the first time in her life, felt a painful self-consciousness; there was something in the dark penetrating glance of this strong man so different from the mildness and timidity of his brother Seth." (Eliot 2003: 99) She cannot refrain from comparing Adam with Seth and finds his glance "dark" and "penetrating". The second adjective has a phallic implication and they both suggest Adam's powerful masculinity contrasted with Seth's "mildness and timidity". Thus, Dinah's reaction is thoroughly feminine: "A faint blush came, which deepened as she wondered why" (Eliot 2003: 99) Impressed by Adam's masculinity, Dinah blushes femininely and this happens for the first time in her life, as is mentioned in the previous quotation. Her preference for Adam is another proof of her femininity; she is instinctively attracted towards "this strong man" and she rejects Seth, the timid and mild brother.

Seth Bede was very pleased by the encounter between Adam and Dinah. He cherished Adam's opinion and considered him brother very trustworthy. "He wanted Adam to know how much better she was than all other women." (Eliot 2003: 101) As is the first time Adam really takes notice of Dinah, his appreciation of her is based on physical aspects rather than inner qualities. According to him, "I don't wonder at thee for loving her, Seth. She's got a face like a lily." (Eliot 2003: 104) Seth admits that he loves her, maybe "too much." However, he knows that his love for her is hopeless and he openly expresses his firm belief that Dinah would never marry. "But she doesn't love me, lad, only as one child o' God loves another. She'll never love any man as a husband – that's my belief." (Eliot 2003: 104)

Dinah rejects Seth in the beginning of the novel, namely in the third chapter. He tries to persuade her using examples from the Bible and he is very affected by his speech: "his cheeks became flushed as he went on, his mild grey eyes filled with tears, and his voice trembled." (Eliot 2003: 28) As proved in the previous paragraph, this timid attitude fails to impress Dinah, so she tells him that their marriage is not God's will and that she desires "to live and die without husband or children." (Eliot 2003: 29) Dinah refuses Seth "in the belief that it is God's will that she should devote herself to her vocation" (Rignall 2000: 5), however her firm belief that she should only follow her vocation changes in the end of the novel when she marries Adam.

In Chapter fifty-two, Adam confesses to Dinah his love for her and she admits that she loves her too, but still rejects the idea of marriage because she considers it is not the path God chose for her in life. Later on, in Chapter fifty-four, she admits to Adam that "it is the Divine Will [...] now you are with me, and I feel that our hearts are filled with the same love, I have a fullness of strength to bear and do our heavenly Father's Will, that I had lost before." (Eliot 2003: 458) Both of them are content and feel that marriage is the best decision. MCSweeney considers that "the novel is as much a study of first love as it is of the later love that is linked to sorrow." (1991: 70) However, the later love between Adam and Dinah is animated by a sense that they do the right thing; it is not shaded by any sorrow, neither by Adam's memories of Hetty, nor even by a hypothetical feeling of guilt towards Seth whose importance in the plot fades significantly.

In his article from Early Victorian Novelists, 1935, David D. Cecil presents the marriage between Dinah and Adam as "very unlikely" and considers it more like a way to adequately reward these two characters for their virtue. "In order to achieve structural symmetry, George Eliot has been forced to relax her vigilant grip on truth." (Cecil in Haigh 1965: 208) Seth's lack of hard feelings makes him too good to be true and too unrealistic. In the end, he loses any importance as a character, his love is rejected and it can be argued even that his brother disregarded his feelings, but at the wedding of Adam and Dinah presented in Chapter fifty-five, he is "serenely happy" (Eliot 2003: 459). This is the only thing the reader learns about Seth, which proves that even the narrator seems to disregard the character and his feelings. Thus, Seth turns out again as merely a narrative tool that foregrounds the character of his brother.

3. Godfrey and Dunstan Cass

Introduced in the third Chapter of Silas Marner, Godfrey and Dunstan are the sons of the Squire Cass, who is "the greatest man in Raveloe." (Silas Marner, Eliot [1993] 1999: 19) Godfrey is the elder brother and has a better nature than Dunstan. The younger brother is commonly called Dunsey, a short form which emphasizes that he is a childish spoiled person and lacks responsibility.

Godfrey and Dunsey are presented contrastively in Chapter three, through the eyes of the community. "[P]eople shook their heads at the courses of the second son" and "the neighbours said" that it was no matter what became of Dunsey as long as "his doings did not bring trouble on a family like Squire Cass's" which was old and respectable (Eliot 1999: 20). The narrator expresses the community's opinion when saying that "it would be a thousand pities if Mr Godfrey [...] should take to going along the same road as his brother." (Silas Marner: 20) He is referred to as "Mr Godfrey", emphasizing that this is the point of view of the people in Raveloe, because he is the next to come into the land some day" after the Squire Cass' end. According to the same public opinion whose views are not contradicted by the narrator, Godfrey is described as "a fine, open-faced, good-natured young man", whereas Dunsey is "a spiteful jeering fellow" (Eliot 1999: 20).

Darrol quoted in Draper observes that "The potential evil in these characteristics of the Dunsan family is fully realized in Dunsan" who "presents the extreme possibility of what Godfrey might become in his deterioration" (1977: 194). Thus, Dunsan is the black sheep of the Dunsan family and embodies the evils that threaten his brother's nature. The younger brother becomes a mere term of comparison to emphasize Godfrey's still unshaken sense of morality and redemption. His presence is also a threat towards Godfrey's development.

It can be argued whether Godfrey Dunsan is really one of the main characters of the novel that has as its main plot the story of Silas Marner, the weaver rejected by his community in the small village of Lantern Yard who comes to live in Raveloe, adopts the orphan Eppie and becomes gradually an active part of the community. Pinion considers Godfrey Dunsan to be "the central figure on the other side of Raveloe" (1981: 136), as one of the multiple plots of the story concerns him and his life and marriage with Nancy Lammer. Moreover, he is Eppie's real father, and he chooses to make this known to Nancy, Eppie, and Silas only when the girl is eighteen. This makes James, quoted in Haigh to observe that "Godfrey Dunsan with his life-long secret is by right the hero of Silas Marner." (1965: 47) Thus, this section will deal with the relationship between Godfrey and Dunsan Dunsan, focusing on the Dunsan family and the punishment of the two brothers for their different sins.

Godfrey and Dunsan Dunsan had been raised without a mother by the Squire. Through the sad atmosphere evoked by the description of the relations in the Dunsan family, the narrator addresses a critique to the Squire's way of raising his sons. In the third chapter, the readers find out that "the Squire's wife had died long ago, and the Red House was without the presence of the wife and mother which is the fountain of wholesome love and fear in parlour and kitchen." (Elio 1999: 20) A woman's presence would have brought love in the relationships between the members of the family and she would have exercised her authority over the household matters. Thus, the life of the Dunsan family in the Red House lacked both love and order.

The narrator reiterates this idea in the same chapter when presents Godfrey's wish to marry Nancy Lammer, who "would make his home lovely to him, as his father's home had never been" (Elio 1999: 27). Godfrey searches for a homely home, an ordered universe sweetened by love. "Godfrey's was an essentially domestic nature, bred up in a home where the hearth had no smiles, and where the daily habits were not chastised by the presence of household order" (Elio 1999: 27). The lack of smiles is emphasized again later on, in the ninth chapter. After finishing his breakfast Godfrey lingers longer in the parlor, waiting for his father "but there was no pleasant morning greeting between them; not because of any unfriendliness, but because the sweet flower of courtesy is not a growth of such homes as the Red House." (Elio 1999: 58) Even though the relations between Godfrey and the Squire want courtesy, the narrator emphasizes the lack of unfriendliness in these relations. The Squire seems not to care too much about his sons' development of character; therefore his attitude towards them is both indulgent and uninterested in any improvement in their nature.

Godfrey feels the Squire's lack of interest in his sons and he is not very comfortable with the manner in which he has been brought up. The narrator tells the readers that Godfrey "was not likely to be very penetrating in his judgments, but he always had a sense that his father's indulgent had not been kindness, and had had a vague longing for some discipline that would have checked his own errant weakness, and helped his better will." (Eliot 1999: 61) According to Draper, "Squire's ass embodies this indulgent illogical approach to life which Godfrey disapproves of yet has not the strength of character to resist" (1977: 193) Godfrey is not sure how he wished his father to be; he only had a "vague longing", thus Draper concludes that Godfrey lacks strength of character. The Squire also criticizes his son and accuses him of having a hesitating nature: "You're a shilly-shally fellow; you take after your poor mother. [...] you hardly know your own mind enough to make both your legs walk one way." (Eliot 1999: 62) In increasing that the Squire finds Godfrey similar to his mother in hesitation; the reader can suppose that maybe the Squire's wife would not have kept the household in a strong grip if she had lived.

Dunsey threatens his brother for money: "I might tell the Squire how his handsome son was married to that nice young woman, Molly Farren, and was very unhappy because he couldn't live with his drunken wife, and I should slip in to your place as comfortable as could be." (Eliot 1999: 22) Dunsey only wants his brother's money and maybe he is too cowardly really to do on Godfrey. He ironically boasts about his nice nature: "But, you see, I don't do it – I'm so easy and good-natured." (Eliot 1999: 22) The reader can never know for sure whether Dunsey really meant to do his father Godfrey's secret because he disappears at the end of the fourth chapter and his dead body is found in chapter eighteen, as the paper will later discuss in the next subsection.

Godfrey tells his brother that he does not have as much money as Dunsey asks for, and the older brother concludes that maybe he should confess everything to the Squire, as his wife is also threatening to come and tell his father. "You drain me of money till I've got nothing to pacify her with, and she'll do as she threatens some day. It's all one. I'll tell my father everything myself, and you may go to the devil." (Eliot 1999: 23) However, in the end of the eighth chapter, Godfrey changes his mind and decides to keep his secret from the Squire and to continue to be on Dunsey's side. "He had been in a rage with Dunstan, and had thought of nothing but a thorough break-up of their mutual understanding; but what it would be really wise for him to do, was to try and soften his father's anger against Dunsey, and keep things as nearly as possible in their old condition." (Eliot 1999: 58) It is interesting how the name he uses for his younger brother changes. When Godfrey was angry with his brother, he named him "Dunstan", whereas when he decides to side with him in front of their father, he uses the short form of his brother's name and calls him "Dunsey". This reveals Godfrey's struggle as he is trying to persuade himself into feeling some brotherly affection for Dunstan. It is not a sign of the existence of genuine affection between the two brothers. The relationship between them is more like a business relation filled with resentment.

Each of the two brothers commits a sin for which he is punished accordingly. Dunstan commits the sin of stealing Silas Marner's money and ends up dead, fallen in the Stone-pit full with water close to the weaver's cottage. No one in Raveloe knew who took Silas' gold and where Dunsan wenunđil his body was found sixteen years laer. It is Godfrey's ass who decides to drain the Stone-piland this is how Dunsan's body is found, recognized by his watch and seals. Godfrey now finds his gold-handled whip, as he never knew that his brother took it. Everybody in Raveloe finds out who stole the weaver's money sixteen years ago and the gold is returned to its rightful owner.

Godfrey wants to hide his previous committments to Molly Farren and to pass childless, in order to marry Nancy Lamme. On the New Year's Eve, Molly decides to go to the Red House with her small daughter and expose Godfrey's secret in front of all the guests at the fancy party there. But she cannot finish the journey without taking some opium on the way, thus she falls asleep in the snow near the Stone-piland and freezes to death. Her baby enters the weaver's cottage unseen and sits in front of the hearth to get warm. Silas decides to keep the child and to name her Hephzibah, and call her Eppie. The name Hephzibah comes from the Bible: "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate; but thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah; for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married." (Isaiah 62:4, King James Bible) In George Eliot's Silas Marner, the choice of this name emphasizes the lucky shift in the child's situation, from a forsaken person to a child who belongs somewhere and who brings delight to her father. Godfrey feels relieved upon finding out that his wife died and he does not acknowledge Eppie as his daughter. Thus, the child is raised by Silas Marner and Godfrey marries Nancy.

The brothers' sins affect Silas Marner in complementary ways. Dunsan takes the money away from the weaver and Godfrey's silent condemnation of Eppie to commit the child to Silas. The weaver considers the child as a replacement for his lost gold and he is aware that Eppie brought him more happiness than his money could have done. Thus, in terms of their influence on Silas' life, Dunsan deprives the weaver of something and Godfrey makes a gift to him. When Dunsan's theft is discovered sixteen years later, the gold is restored to the weaver just in time to support Eppie in her new life, as she decided to marry Aaron Winthrop, a working man.

Upon the discovery of his brother's body, Godfrey is "convinced that he lives in an ordered universe." (Parroll in Draper 1977: 205) This is what triggers his decision to be honest with Nancy and tell her his secret: "Everything comes to light, Nancy, sooner or later. When God Almighty wills it, our secrets are found out. I've lived with a secret on my mind, but I'll keep from you no longer." (Eliot 1999: 141) Upon finding out about Eppie, Nancy's reaction is quite unexpected: she reproaches Godfrey for not having told her earlier about this. Now it turns out that Godfrey's lie is a bigger sin than having been married. He is punished for keeping his intelligence away from his wife, as the weaver also reproaches him the same thing: "why didn't you say so sixteen years ago, and claim her before I'd come to love her [...] [...] repentance doesn't alter what's been going on for sixteen years." (Eliot 1999: 147) Eppie refuses to live with the Dunsan family and Godfrey must bear his penance for not having acknowledged his child; he is denied for the rest of his life the blessing of being a father.

Quoted in Draper considers that "Godfrey is a more complex character than [his brother] because his escapism has not hardened into viciousness" (1977: 194-195) Godfrey's sin is also more complex than Dunsen's and even himself fails to comprehend it. He feels that his guilt is mainly having been married to Molly Farren and being Eppie's father. Only when Nancy makes him aware that he should have told her everything earlier, does he realize that his sin is not having acknowledged Eppie as his child and keeping silence on the child's parentage.

Godfrey thinks their childlessness to be "a retribution" (Pinion 1981: 137) especially that Nancy and he had a daughter who died a birth. Sixteen years before, he wanted to pass childless in order to marry Nancy; later on he wished to avoid acknowledging Eppie as his child. The punishment came when their daughter died a birth and it was thoroughly accomplished through Eppie's refusal to have him as her father. Bearing his penance makes Godfrey a better person, as he feels to be rightly deprived of the opportunity to be a father. "The continuity of Godfrey's life is also restored when he acknowledges his past and his pattern and is made to endure, clear-eyed and chastened, the childlessness that is his appropriate penance." (Rignall 2000: 387) He is a better man now, bearing his penance and acknowledging his real mistake; as opposed to his brother who is not given the possibility to repent.

Haunted by his brother's menace, Godfrey would not have had the chance to become a better person. After his brother disappeared, "Godfrey had ceased to see the shadow of Dunsey across his path; [...]. Everybody said Mr Godfrey had taken the right turn." (Silas Marner: 115) Dunsen turns out to be a narrative tool, as both his presence and his absence have a certain impact upon his brother and influence Godfrey's reactions and attitudes. The narrator uses Dunsen in order to emphasize the turns in Godfrey's nature and to foreground the fact that the older brother can be a better person after escaping the younger brother's menace and bad influence.

4. Dorothea and Celia Brooke

The first book in George Eliot's Middlemarch is named "Miss Brooke". The first sentence of the novel presents a remark upon her beauty, and it begins with the words "Miss Brooke". The narrator refers to Dorothea, even though her first name is mentioned on the second page of the novel. She is contrasted to her younger sister Celia through the means of the public opinion: Dorothea "was usually spoken of as being remarkably clever, but with the addition that her sister Celia had more common-sense." (Middlemarch, Eliot [1994] 2000: 5) Dorothea is one of the main characters in Middlemarch as one of the plots of the novel is centered on her, following her two marriages, and her relationship to the young and ambitious doctor Tertius Lydgate and his wife Rosamond. The doctor's life and struggles are followed by another plot of the novel.

Dorothea is very clever and has high aspirations which sometimes make her impulsive and impatient, whereas Celia Brooke, Dorothea's sister, is interested in more worldly things and lacks high aspirations. Beauty quoted in Hardy considers Celia "a minor character" and he counts among her major features her "concern for appearances, her suspicion of all enthusiasm, her social realism." (1967: 49) Even as a minor character, Delia has a well-defined role in foregrounding Dorothea and her features. The two sisters have always different opinions; however there is a strong sisterly attachment between them. The narrator suggests that Dorothea's high aspirations do not bring her happiness, whereas Delia's "social realism" (Beatty in Hardy 1967: 49) is more likely to render her happy. The following subsections will focus on the relation between the Brooke sisters and on their marriages: Dorothea's first marriage to Edward Deasubon, her second to Will Ladislaw, Deasubon's younger cousin, and Delia's marriage to Sir James Deham, who is rejected by the older sister in the beginning of the novel.

The Brooke sisters are depicted in the first chapter of the novel. The narrator presents Dorothea working in their "preliminary-room" when Delia asks her to take a look at their deceased mother's jewels and divide them (Eliot 2000: 8-9). Dorothea is genuinely surprised by her sister's wish to wear them but does not criticize her in any way and the two sisters proceed to analyze the jewels. Dorothea is not interested in the jewels but she is eventually impressed by the color of emeralds and decides to keep a set composed of an emerald ring and a bracelet. She thinks that "gems are used as spiritual emblems in the Revelation of St. John" because "they look like fragments of heaven" (Eliot 2000: 10) and this reasoning persuades her in keeping them. Thus, Pinion considers that Dorothea's "unworldliness is manifest in indifference to all jewels except those which have a spiritual meaning for her" (1981: 197) as opposed to Delia who is enthusiastic to have their mother's jewels and finds a pleasure in trying them.

Dorothea Brooke is sometimes presented through Delia's perspective. According to Armstrong quoted in Hardy, George Eliot's one has a "generous compassionateness" – "when there is anything harsh to be said, somebody else in the novel says it" (1970: 119). Thus, the narrator does not criticize directly the characters, but makes them criticize one another. According to Armstrong quoted in Hardy: "It is Delia who says the harshest things about Dorothea" (1970: 119). In the ninth chapter Delia openly tells her sister that she is very impatient "when people don't do and say just what you like" (Eliot 2000: 68). This instance proves this paper's argument namely that George Eliot uses the siblings' relationship in order to foreground the main character's features, this time through the means of open criticism and direct characterization.

According to Knoepflmacher quoted in Adam, Dorothea is "the major, the most memorable, character in the novel" (1975: 65). Her last name, Brooke represents an allusion "to currents and streams – of water as well as of feeling and thought" (1975: 66). Delia's name is a short form of Delia, a Latin name, and the patron saint of music, a hint to her enjoyment of worldly things. Moreover, the name of Delia can also be traced back to the Latin word "caecus" which means "blind". Delia may be blind for the high aspirations, but she sees things better than her sister does; Dorothea is both trapped by her dreams and literally shortsighted.

Dorothea tells Sir James Deham about her bad eye-sight when he offers her a puppy as a pet and she rejects it. Dorothea tells him that her sister's opinion might be different from hers, as ∇ elia "had a tiny carrier one, which she was very fond of. I am a me unhappy, because I was a afraid of reading on it I am rather short sighted." (Eliott 2000: 25) Wheeler considers that Dorotea's shortsightedness is manifested also on the metaphorical level; he refers to the sisters' discussion in the second chapter (Eliott 2000: 16). "Miss Brooke is both literally and metaphorically shortsighted, seeing a great soul in ∇ asaubon where her sister ∇ elia sees only white moles." (Wheeler 1994: 146) ∇ elia's worldly instincts are right regarding ∇ asaubon who brings her sister's unhappiness. In his case Dorotea is wrong, as later on in the novel his intellectual endeavors prove to be a failure and he cannot finish his important work, "The Key to All Mythologies".

In Middlemarch, George Eliott makes wide use of the metaphor of the eyes and of seeing things. Dorotea is strongly impressed by the scene between Rosamond Lydgate and Will Ladislaw and it is ∇ elia who notices that something happened upon her arrival home: "Dodo, how very bright your eyes are! [...] And you don't see anything you look at" (Eliott 2000: 638). Still thinking about Rosamond and Ladislaw, Dorotea's eyes get bright but her eyesight gets worse. This is a metaphor for the character being concerned with things beyond the view of people around her, as no one knew about Rosamond and Ladislaw's encounters; whereas her interest for visible, familiar things diminishes.

Hornbark quoted by Pangallo observes that "When the story is concerned with Dorotea, it is usually concerned almost singly with her and ignores the other characters. All the attention is on her in her scenes with ∇ elia [and other characters]." (1994: 163) He considers that the other characters "are merely her supports or foils" (1994: 163). This is a narrative device used by George Eliott in Middlemarch, as well as in Adam Bede and Silas Marner; as his paper proves. The main character is foregrounded through comparisons with the other characters, as well as through their opinions regarding the main character. It is mostly through the siblings' relation that the main character is presented. George Eliott presents to narratively " ∇ elia's accommodating spirit [and] Dorotea's rebellious, at times almost sagged state of mind" (∇ oles quoted in Pangallo 1994: 177). ∇ oles continues by emphasizing Dorotea's aspirations as opposed to her sister's passiveness and will to be dominated. But as the plot develops, Dorotea's aspirations do not make her happy and she realizes that her marriage with ∇ asaubon was a mistake; whereas ∇ elia's lower thoughts lead her to a happy life with no sorrows.

According to Hudson quoted in ∇ arroll, ∇ elia belongs to "the type of pre-lyrical, gentle, sensible, limited young ladies" that George Eliott "decidedly dislikes" (1971: 295). However, Eliott has a mild attitude towards ∇ elia; she does not dislike the character but looks upon her with a kind of favorable understanding.

An important feature of ∇ elia is "her affection for Dodo, often apprehensive, disappointing and even resentful, and always miscomprehending Dorotea's passion for service [...] but still sisterly, and of a covered warmth." (Tompkins in Hardy 1967: 175) In the first chapter, the narrator tells the readers that "since [the sisters] could remember, there had been a mixture of criticism and awe in the attitude of ∇ elia's mind towards her elder sister" (Eliott 2000: 12). This mixture of criticism and awe is doubled by a sisterly affection that springs from ∇ elia's mildness. If her critical nature had been doubled by strong principles, then she would have been stricter towards Dorothea. But Elia cannot be mean to her sister and cannot refrain from loving her unconditionally, even if she sometimes criticizes Dorothea. But so does the entire Middlemarch community when it comes to Dorothea's choices for marriage.

Elia's marriage to Sir James Deane, Dorothea's rejected suitor, represents the reverse situation of Adam's marriage to Dinah. In Adam Bede, Dinah rejects the brother and marries the main character. In Middlemarch, Dorothea, the main character, refuses Sir James who marries her sister. In this case, Elia takes what the older sister does not want and her happy peaceful life with Sir James is contrasted to Dorothea's perpetual unease and aspirations.

According to an unsigned review of the novel, published in Saturday Review of the 7th of December 1872 and quoted by Pangallo, Elia's virtues are "fain and 'neutral'" (1994: 148). She is "a foil to [Dorothea's] high sentiments" and "never goes contrary to our sense of what is amiable and dutiful in woman." (Pangallo 1994: 149) The author of this review openly compares the two sisters and states that Dorothea is more clever than her sister, but Elia "has more worldly wisdom, which means perhaps more insurmountable perceptions; and not feeling it her duty to subvert the world, she can take her place in it naturally." (Pangallo 1994: 149) This is why Dorothea thinks Deane likely to make a good husband for Elia, even though she does not consider him suitable for herself.

When she learns about Elia's engagement to Sir James, Dorothea says that it was as she "used to hope and believe." (Elio 2000: 229) Her words towards her sister are "I do believe you could not marry better, Kitty. Sir James is a good, honourable man." (Elio 2000: 230) Dorothea did not want Sir James for herself, but considers him good enough for her sister. In the third chapter, Dorothea misunderstands him and considers that his attentions are directed towards Elia and not towards herself. Thus, she is very surprised when her sister draws her attention towards Sir James' interest in her. Dorothea rapidly dismisses any speculation upon this problem, as in the fifth chapter she accepts Edward Casaubon's marriage proposal (Elio 2000: 36). This makes Elia really sorry for her sister's future life as she feels that there was "something funereal in the whole affair" (Elio 2000: 40).

In his article published in Blackwood's Magazine in December 1872 and quoted by Pangallo, Collins considers that "all who set before them an object in life higher than their fellows, fall in its attainment" (1994: 153) and he mentions Casaubon, Lydgate, and Dorothea as examples from the novel. He contrasts them with James Deane, Will Ladislaw, Fred Vinny, and Elia "who come out on the whole, with the largest share of commonplace happiness." (1994: 153) The main distinction made by Collins is between Dorothea with her high aspirations and Elia "with her kitchen-like content and hatred of 'nothings'" (1994: 153). Dorothea's decision to marry Casaubon is determined by her aspirations. She believes in him and in his intellectual endeavors, and her goal is to be useful to him in his work, "The Key to All Mythologies". But as the plot develops, their married life makes them both unhappy and he fails in his research. The Brooke sisters have very different opinions about Casaubon and "Elia's 'naïve malice' shows more perception than her sister's insinuations" (Pinion 1981: 181). Dorothea idealizes him and dismisses the faults that Elia finds in him as things that only the "common minds" observe (Eliot 2000: 39). Elia finds him ugly and does not like the way he eats his soup; and these reasons are enough for Elia to dislike him as a person.

After Deasauvon's death, Dorothea feels betrayed when she finds out that her late husband mentioned in his will that she would lose all the property if she married Will Ladislaw: "it was a violent shock of repulsion from her departed husband, who had hidden thoughts, perhaps perverting every thing she said and did." (Eliot 2000: 405) It is Elia who tells Dorothea about this stipulation in Deasauvon's will; but Elia does not notice the real effect of this information upon her sister and her interior struggle; she is busy with her baby and notices "nothing more than that Dorothea was leaning back in her chair, and likely to be passive." (Eliot 2000: 405)

It is very interesting that Dorothea had no thought about Ladislaw as a possible lover before Elia told her about Deasauvon's will. It was then that Dorothea felt "a sudden strange yearning of heart towards Will Ladislaw" as "it had never before entered her mind that she could, under any circumstances, be her lover" (Eliot 2000: 405). Later on they fall in love and marry; thus Dorothea goes from one extreme to the other. In her marriage to Ladislaw, Dorothea has to assume a totally different role from the one she had in her marriage to Deasauvon. In her first marriage, she was a young woman with high aspirations, ready to submit herself to her old and wise husband's will and to help him in achieving his high goals. In her later marriage, Dorothea is wiser than her husband and she has to assume the role of the guardian. In chapter eighty, the narrator mentions the sight of "a man with a bundle on his back and a woman carrying her baby" (Eliot 2000: 648). The sight is a metaphor for the lives of the main characters from two of the plots in the novel: the man is Tertius Lydgate and the bundle is his wife Rosamond who is always hindering his plans, whereas the woman is Dorothea who has to carry her child-like husband and guide him.

In the end of the novel, the narrator presents Dorothea's portrayal by the future generations in Middlemarch. She was considered to have married first "a sickly clergyman, old enough to be her father" and then "his cousin – young enough to have been his son, with no property and not well-born". The general opinion was that Dorothea "could not have been 'a nice woman', else she would not have married either the one or the other." (Eliot 2000: 688) Of course, this does not do justice to the memory of Dorothea, whose marriage with Deasauvon took the shape of an act of self-sacrifice, followed by her wish to be free which materialized in her marriage to Ladislaw. According to Simcox quoted in Haigh: "Dorothea is a perfect woman, but for a perfect woman any marriage is a mésalliance" (1965: 76) and as the final passage of Middlemarch (quoted above) shows, posterity did women wrong by judging them from the perspective of their marriages.

5. Conclusions

After analyzing three of George Eliot's novels, this paper proved that the author uses the siblings' relation as a means to emphasize the main character's features. The author gradually develops this technique and makes it better, as it is foregrounded by the choice of novels in this paper. In Adam Bede, her first novel, Eliot uses Sethmosely to reflects his brother Adam. Seth does not play an important part in the novel and his role is even more diminished through his passivity towards Adam's marriage to Dinah. Silas Marner is the author's third novel, and here Dunsen represents a bad influence on his brother Godfrey. George Eliot's narrative skills become more subtle, as she makes him disappear in the first half of the novel. Then it is Dunsen's absence which foregrounds Godfrey's character and even shapes some of his features.

In Middlemarch, George Eliot's sixth and most complex novel, the main character is a woman who has a sister, so the author uses a relation between female siblings. She shapes Dorothea as a very complex character, whereas her sister Felia is less complex but very consistent. The relationship between them strongly foregrounds Dorothea, and Felia's consistency as a character is an efficient narrative tool in emphasizing her sister's rashness in following her aspirations.

Among the various narrative devices used by George Eliot the relation between siblings is a very interesting and efficient one. It engages the readers to a high extent as it provides them with a more complex view upon the main character's thoughts and feelings. Moreover, this narrative tool proves the author's subtlety and, as showed by the present analysis, it becomes better developed in George Eliot's later novels.

Debating the Psychologically Disturbed Characters in Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire

ABSTRACT

Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire has fascinated readers and audiences with his showing so many sour points in brief instances that reflect various aspects of life. From the poor background where the action takes place to the dreamy atmosphere, this main female character first exposes to the public both the audience and the critics cannot overlook the play. The characters that the playwright created present different signs of personality disorders and although they intend for others to perceive them as "normal individuals", they actually put on a mask intended to deceive the others. The vices that surround Williams' characters are intended to allure the readers into a story where no one is perfect and the imperfection they display makes one wonder how circumstances could interfere with one's destiny. The paper intends to discuss the psychological problems of Williams' protagonists and to carefully analyse the development of the behavioural problems taking into account the playwright's biography and his own additions, which led him to a blocked creative output. The schizophrenic sister and the recognition of his homosexuality clearly influenced the author in developing the personalities of his characters unfortunately leading him to his death and them to their destruction.

KEYWORDS: disillusion, violence, addiction

Williams' desire of debating and analysing the intriguing world of the inner disturbances society was facing led him to investigate many topics, which might have seemed rather daring for the time – "nymphomania, promiscuity, rape, greed, alcoholism, impotence, homosexuality, profligacy, frigidity, crib fetishism, paedophilia, blowtorch killing, castration, dope addiction, venereal disease, cannibalism, madness, pan-fetishism, masochism, auto-prophagy" (Williams, apud Hirsch 1979: 3). In his interview from 1973 for Playboy, the playwright indicated his curiosity about issues that might be called nightmares for the society and which transformed themselves into diseases affecting more and more modern individuals, which were transposed in his work. The trail of such insights can easily be noticed in one of his most appraised works – A Streetcar Named Desire. The author's well known style brings together social constraints, vibrant emotions and different types of pathologies. Many of the critics have chosen to relate to his sister's health problems and their close connection in order to explain numerous of his characters and their reactions. They had an unhappy childhood, with an alcoholic father and a disturbed mother, finding the only support that mother was to take care of each other, leading to lifelong full of depression. His father was a travelling agent who enjoyed ridiculing his children and called Tennessee "Miss Nancy" referring directly to his sexuality. After his father's death the author suffered a complete breakdown, so he started entering psychoanalysis with Dr Kubie.

Rose, the author's sibling suffered from schizophrenia and in 1943, she had a frontal lobectomy, which haunted Williams all his life and was reflected in his work, as he also feared for his own sanity. After the surgery, she had moments of madness and he even mentioned that he could not forgive himself for what had happened to her, but also feared that something similar could represent his future as well. The relationship between the two marked much of his writing as he both wanted to keep close to his sister, but also separate from her. This might be the explanation why his female characters are alienated, and suffer from some type of condition, which makes them vulnerable, unable to catch up with the world, feeling overwhelmed and defeated.

Tennessee Williams dedicated his life to writing and re-writing his works as he had to fight loneliness, promiscuity, anxiety, depression, hypochondriasis, alcohol, and drug addiction. This kept him busy and freed him from the burdens of life. Some time before his death, he gave an explanation in one of his last diary entries and mentioned that

In my life, extra – familial, what has happiness been but a series of disappointments of experience, encompassing no much time. But yes, there was work, and if I ran before death to perform it, this saying of truth as I felt it then – whatever it costs me when completed – whatever was discarded on the way – friendship or love sanely or that which is so regarded, I may deeply regret but would not wish to choose otherwise.

The plays that earned a name for Williams were the kind which deal with rather insightful themes mostly the mental situations of his characters and their inner struggles. The language the author used was rather unusual for the time being different from his contemporary fellow playwrights such as Eugene O'Neill, Arthur Miller and Edward Albee, who were heavily influenced by the postwar period. Williams not only deconstructed the Old South tradition, but also brought to the attention of the audience strange concepts, which dealt with madness, violence, prostitution, homosexuality and even cannibalism in a poetic manner that was different from the usual dramatic style of the time.

A Streetcar Named Desire like all of his work is emotionally autobiographical as the author stated several times and was written in a period when Williams was recovering from health problems and felt a thirst for creation, liberating himself on paper regarding issues that had troubled him for some time. Williams had themes which were re-invented over and over again "Tennessee is the sort of writer who does not develop; he simply continues. By the time he was an adolescent, he had his themes... I am no aware that any new information (or feelings?) has gone through to him in the [past] twenty-eight years." (Gale; apud Griffies 2006: 112)

The play begins with the arrival of southern belle, Blanche DuBois who comes and moves in with her sister and her Polish brother-in-law. From the very beginning it is obvious to the audience that Blanche will never fit in her sister's life and will not adapt to Stanley's rules. Her sister's husband is definitely portrayed as the alpha male and Blanche represents the challenge to his authority. She does not treat him as he would expect and "when she laughs at him, spraying him with perfume, teasing him, treating him as a little boy, he responds with irritation and rising anger" (Tishler 2002: 51). For Stanley her disobeying of his authority is something which sets his mind to eliminate her realizing that he must think of something which drives her away from his house for good. The contrast between the two is obvious from the beginning from Williams' description; delicate vs. brusque, educated vs. uneducated, illusion vs. reality. When Blanche appears in the neighbourhood her sister Stella lives in there is a visible discrepancy between herself and the surroundings. There is no indication that she would ever adapt to such a place, where no one offers her protection and where the old South is dying and the new one is taking control.

Her appearance is incongruent to his setting. She is daintily dressed in a white suit with fluffy bodice, necklace, and earrings of pearl, white glove and hair looking as if she were arriving at a summer tea or cocktail party in the Garden District. Her delicate beauty must avoid strong light. There is something about her unattractive manner as well as the white clothes that suggest a moth.

One of the first lines regarding Blanche's preoccupation with her appearance and with her being liked is the question she asks her sister "Will Stanley like me, or will I be just advising in-law, Stella? I couldn't stand that" (Williams 1951: 17) The revealing line that she could not bear such a situation of rejection emphasises the haunting suicide of her husband and the trauma of this rejection, which has never been treated accordingly. Stella's response to the question is one which shows that the following events will not be fortunate ones as she asks her sister to refrain from expressing her usual ideas "You'll get along fine together – if you'll just try not to – well – compare him with the men that we went out with at home." (Williams 1951: 17) Blanche being an adept of the old South would like traditions to be kept and for her lifestyle to remain the same, but nothing lasts forever. "The implied interculturalism of Stella and Stanley, and Blanche's fear of the bastardization of culture, reflects Williams' own contradictory response to the survival of the South in the context of the edgling Civil Rights movement of the 1950s." (Van Duyvenbode 2001: 214)

While Stanley is better acquainted to the place and fits the setting, his description is coldly condescending that of his sister-in-law, showing from the very first sentence that he regards women as inferior to men, or at least to himself as he observes them with a critical attitude. His belief that his masculinity is appealing to any type of woman, considering the healthy sexual life he enjoys with his wife, who tries to please him in every aspect of life, makes him act as no one other could contradict or stand up to him for too long. He is the dark male of the play manipulating others through charm or physical force and whatever it takes for him to succeed. As Stanley is an immigrant, his desire to stay in control of his situation is even greater:

He is of medium height about five foot eight or nine, and strongly, compactly built. Animal joy is in his being as implicit as all his movements and attitudes. Since earliest manhood, the center of his life has been pleasure with women, the giving and taking of it, not with weak indulgence, dependently, but with a power and pride of a richly feathered male bird among hens. He sizes up women as a glance, with sexual classifications, crude images flashing into his mind and determining the way he smiles at them.

(Williams 1951: 29)

From the beginning of her visit Blanche slowly tries to make things happen, as she desires and Stella being caught in the middle intends to offer her a cosy home, while recovering from her problems and trying to make Stanley happy as well. The sacrifice Stella makes of offering herself to please other people is an unbearable one and leads to the tragic end of her sister, as she refuses to accept reality – that the father of her baby is the rapist of her only sister. By choosing to stay by her husband and newly born child, excluding the burden Blanche could become in time illustrates the way in which Stella is offered no other option in order to have a decent family life.

All throughout the play Stella insinuates that Blanche's nerves are creating problems and she always has to find ways to calm down. The recurrent ritual of bathing characterises Blanche as she wants to get away from the world and wash away her thoughts and feelings. She needs constant reassurance regarding her looks and her taste in fashion. Stella even tells Stanley to "admire her dress and tell her she's looking wonderful. That's important with Blanche. Her little weakness!" (Williams, 1951: 33), but he does not seem the least interested in doing such a gesture; he is focused on the loss of Belle Reve the family estate and the circumstances of how it happened. His hunger insinuation is activated and he is determined to have things the way he desires no matter the circumstances:

As the story unfolds, the audience witnesses the progressive victimization of Blanche by the brutish Stanley. He bristles over Blanche's need to hold on to her illusory world of gentleman callers and a genteel Old South. He can not see her fragility, her sensitivity, or the empty loneliness that compels her to engulf others. He can only see consuming, as eating in lions, a narcissistic hunger that cannibalizes men and boys. He feels that he must destroy her, or be destroyed.

The relationship between Blanche and Stanley is a sado-masochistic one, where none of them wants to give up his/her position. She is definitely a victim to him and she admires his body and even the roughness, which characterizes his attitude and style. Karia views Blanche as a heira – that type of woman who subordinates everything to her finding love, who is found in marriages where having a child is not seen as a priority or in situations when she is the other woman, very different from the maternally oriented official female partner. Blanche is an unadapted heiress or as she would be called a femme fatale whose “possessive love and inordinate solitude might make him seek her image in other women and cripple him psychologically.” (Kalaria 2009: 9)

Blanche uses her sexuality to get her desires fulfilled and tries to escape in a world of fantasy and illusion where she can find comfort for her situation. The obsession with her husband's suicide is revealed throughout the entire play and her fear of death only makes her run more from the current situation. The attraction between herself and the abuser represented by Stanley is one leading to her destructive lifestyle. The changes she has gone through are best expressed when Stella notes that people like her husband have made Blanche the way she is, transforming her from the young trusting beautiful woman that she was into one who will not accept her alcohol problems, her fears and most importantly will not admit her inability to calm her nerves. In the end when Stella sends her away with the psychiatrist it is like the author wants to make sure that his alter ego is saved even though life continues to be rough and sometimes unbearable.

Stanley cannot accept his passive-dependent feelings without fearing that he will be consumed by feminizing cannibalistic women, and Blanche can not accept her oral aggressive and fantasizing wishes without fearing that she will ultimately destroy or push away the man she so desperately feels she needs. So they project these aspects of themselves onto the other, and through projective identification create the victimizing enactments in which each becomes the part of the other they fear the most (Griffies 2006: 121)

The common accepted description of Blanche is that of mad woman, who has bizarre reactions towards different life situations, but as Ribkoff and Tindal state “Blanche is not ‘mad’ in the way that it is tend to believe; she is the victim of trauma with no communal avenue to mourn her losses and integrate her pre- and post-traumatic selves. The distinction is crucial. To treat Blanche as ‘mad’, as her community does, is to dehumanize her, thereby compounding her trauma.” (Ribkoff, Tindal 2011: 337)

The struggle between Blanche and Stanley also involves Mitch, who is, at first, fascinated with her style, as she is completely different from the women he has met before. Her desire to be liked and her wearing of outfits, which are not available from the women of Stella's type, make her different and appealing. While Mitch is more naïve, Stanley is determined to find out all the details about the loss of Belle Reve and implicitly of the money his wife was also meant to inherit and the vague details his sister-in-law has offered. He wants to defend his friend and show his superiority in his accurate investigation regarding Blanche. The violent and sadistic temper of the protagonist is regarded as a mirror of the author's father who was absent for a long time from his life and whenever he decided to return would only create scandal and anxiety. So, this is the situation leading to his terrible action of raping Blanche and saying that their meeting had been something inevitable. “He feels justified in his destruction because he feels menaced by the passive dependency and engulfing cannibalistic wishes that she represents. He uses his phallic dominance over her not to protect or rescue her, as she so desperately wishes, but to rape her. The rape sadistically crushes the last of the narcissistic illusions that support her sanity” (Griffies 2006: 114)

The final line given by Blanche to the psychiatrist who came to take her revealing her comfort around strangers and her relying on them is in fact her projection of Williams' inner self fighting violent and destructive mental states, which he found hard to control and surpass. As O'Connor suggests Blanche's departure does not only have to do with Stella's decision to send her away but also with Mitch's rejection when he found out about her sexual past which he could never accept, but also Stanley's raping her offering her only hostility and no secure place where she could find peace and comfort. Her continuous search for an explanation why her husband was a homosexual and why he stopped finding her attractive after having married her tormented both her mind and soul and his suicide made things even more complicated. Williams' characters once again prove to be an exposure of disturbances troubling generations and generations, sometimes without finding and answer for the devastating situation they are in.

In retrospect, we can see how intricate and nuanced Williams' characterizations, how inexorably entangled his relationships and actions. Like the blues music that understores the entire play, it is full of passion, laughter, brutality, and lyricism. And like Blake's tiger, Blanche and Stanley both stand before a backdrop that is dark and mysterious, not easily understood or domesticated, splendid and dangerous, the creations of an imagination that loved both tigers and lambs.

ABSTRACT: Categorical and Individual in the Plautine Comedies

Within the Plautine theatre, the relation between the categorical and the individual reflected by the characters, either they generally belong to certain social and professional categories, or they are individualized by proper names, is relevant for the Saturnalia symbolic dynamics. Thus, the entire social order is staged and subjected to comic deconstruction, and the proper names function as a referential counterpoint to the symbolic construction of reality evoked through categories. The characters are designed by using abstract categories and this produces a certain dereferentialization, respectively gliding in a completely desirative horizon (the desirative theories of proper names can explain this abstraction) and imposes the symbolic and social order. The use of proper names balances this abstract meta-order at the pole of coningency and referential unity.

KEYWORDS: social and professional categories, individualization, proper name, referentiality, Plautine theatre

Dans le théâtre plautinien, le rapport entre le catégoriel et l'individuel reflété dans la dénomination des personnages en tant qu'appartenance générique aux catégories socio-professionnelles ou bien en tant qu'individualisation sous la marque du nom propre, devient relevant pour la dynamique symbolique de facture saturnaliqve / la présence de ces catégories a pour effet la convoqation et la mise en scène de l'ordre social qui puisse être soumis à la déconstruction comique ; l'intervention des noms propres y fonctionne comme un contrepoint référentiel par rapport à la construction symbolique du réel évoquée à l'aide des catégories. La désignation des personnages par des catégories abstraites détermine donc une dé-référentialité respectivement le glissement dans un horizon purement desiratif (les théories descriptives du nom propre peuvent expliquer un tel pouvoir d'abstraction), tout en donnant la place à l'ordre symbolique et social. L'appellation par des noms propres balance ce méta-ordre abstrait vers le pôle du coningence et de l'unité référentielle.

relations avec l'ouïe complexe rituel où s'esconsuivent la littérature dramatique, respectivement avec les espèces du théâtre populaire italoque, le mime et l'atellane. Équivalant à la farce orale en vers, l'atellane disposait de l'ouïe réperatoire de rôles à masque fixe, qu'on va retrouver chez Plaute, sous une forme remaniée pappus, le vieux vaniteux devenu le père déroné de manière comique dans le théâtre plautinien, maccus, le sol arrogant le soldat fanfaron dérivera, dossenus, le bavard vaniteux, l'archétype du parasite, bucco, le gourmand l'apageur, la préfiguration de l'esclave ave perfide et perspicace, etc.

L'insertion de farces et navalesques du théâtre comique dans le social explicite des réperatoires de rôles qui mettent en abîme la syntaxe sociale en ensemble, la destruction de manière eschérique et ritualisée dans la perspective de son renouvellement. L'origine religieuse et ritualisée du spectacle comique, filée aux niveaux distorsifs socio-politiques ou par les grilles de la vie privée, entraîne la compréhension de la fonction performative, le jeu dramatique familial et renouvelant à la fois le jeu social dans la manière de la catharsis. Le cadre origininaire des fêtes dionysiaques activait les rites de la régénération et de la fertilité (d'où l'atmosphère généralisée de rire et de joie), mais, plus tard, en Latonie sont apparues des représentations à caractère de farce et de pantomime qui ont préparé la composition sociale et politique du théâtre comique, l'ouïe représentation des types humains caractérisés par des défauts physiques ou moraux (l'idiote le parasite, le mendiant l'avare, le boiteux, etc.). Voilà pourquoi Adelina Piatkowski (1998 : 95) explique la destination du théâtre comique latin à partir de ce type de fêtes ritualisées :

Athenaios pretinde, în pasajul citat că asemenea jocuri comice, cum le numește el, s-au transformat în scene inspirate din situații reale ale vieții zilnice. Actorii care le dădeau viață se numeau dikelistai (dikelistai), în Grecia Magna și în Sicilia se numeau filiați (phlyakes) sau sofistai, fiindcă în multe cazuri ironizau învățământul sofistilor. În Italia grecoizată mai ales de emigranți din Pelopones, ele s-au bucurat de un imens succes. Această specie populară a comediei grecești se află la baza comediei latine denumită atellana, dar a influențat și drama satirică, după cum rezultă din opera poetului sicilian Epicharm, din prima jumătate a secolului al V-lea a.n.h., bine apreciat de Arisotel în Poetica (I, 1449) pentru deosebitul său talent literar.¹

Le programme social du théâtre comique utilise aussi des schémas et des structures de farce ritualisée, la performante théâtrale équivalant au rite de l'intégration sociale au cadre duquel, le plus souvent un jeune homme se confirme en l'acquiescement social pour acquiescer, à la fin du parcours initiatique, un rôle social, pérennitaire et matrimonial. Dans son étude dédiée à la poétique de la réflexivité à Rome, Alain Deremez (1995 : 189) identifie de nombreuses équivalences entre le système sémiotique du théâtre comique latin d'un côté et le système social et juridique, de l'autre côté que le théâtre comique codifie selon un schéma ritualisé. Ainsi, ce qui, dans la préhistoire du théâtre comique, fonctionne-il dans le cadre d'un complexe ritualisé lié en principal à la fertilité (les jeux des satyres, le drame satyrique), dans le théâtre comique acquiesce explicitement la fonction d'un rite d'intégration sociale ; le rapport entre l'individuel et le catégoriel (entre les personnages individualisés et les catégories sociales, les statuts, les rôles) reflète ce schéma fondamental. Du point de vue pragmatique, comme embrayage du discours et du spectacle comique à l'intérieur de la société qu'il codifie et décode à la fois, le théâtre comique fonctionne en quelque sorte comme un mythe.

Le spectacle comique apparaît ainsi comme une construction sémantique où s'élabore une image fictive, mais vraisemblable, de l'antérieurité de l'extrinsèque et qui donne à voir une reconstruction plausible des fondements du monde communautaire réel, c'est-à-dire de la société ; et comme le discours cosmogonique le fait pour le monde physique, il réalise son but en décrivant les processus du passage du désordre à l'ordre, de l'envers à l'endroit, de l'extérieur à l'intérieur. L'action comique, nous-le, s'achève quand chacun devient ou redevient une personne sociale qui a rejoint son lieu ; une fois ce résultat acquis, chaque personnage cesse de parler et d'agir et retire son masque.

Le système dramatique du théâtre comique s'émancipe et prend abstraction du répertoire des rôles sociaux soumis à l'inversion de l'officiel et du privé, du marginal et du central, du fixe et du mobile, etc., l'espace théâtral fonctionnant comme un espace par excellence carnavalesque où, par l'inversion des rôles, la libération des différences se produit en obtenant la valeur. Il n'est pas fortuit que les personnages principaux en sont lesquels se réalisent les transitions axiologiques fondamentales, tels que le vieux (senex) et le jeune homme (adulescens), représentent des classes sociales opposées et stables, des positions et des statuts officiels (le corps des magistrats, des prêtres, des soldats, des citoyens en général), tandis que les agents à potentiel conflictuel ou adjuvant apparaissent aux couches marginales (les proxénètes, les courtisanes, les commerçants, les parasites ou les esclaves). Tout en suivant la dynamique de l'individualisation par l'intermédiaire du nom propre et du refoulement sous l'anonymat d'une catégorie ou d'une classe d'appartenance, la même logique de l'inversion articule le rapport de l'acteur avec son propre rôle ou avec son propre statut : les personnages à origine sociale officielle et stable (les citoyens, les magistrats, etc.) qui jouent le rôle sous la marque du nom propre (ils sont des personnages individualisés qui se détachent de leur rôle, le gardent uniquement dans la réserve d'une mémoire sociale), tandis que les personnages secondaires (les parasites, les courtisanes, les proxénètes) se dissolvent sous l'anonymat de classe, officialisant les positions sociales marginales, exclues. Le rapport en est l'opposition des personnages sous la garantie du nom propre ou de la catégorie sociale marque l'inversion de type carnavalesque et satirique en est les rôles, les positions, les statuts sociaux périphériques ou centraux.

Au niveau de l'action dramatique, la fable comique se déroule selon un schéma initial par lequel on apporte des réparations finales à un état initial de déséquilibre, la transition d'un état à l'autre se réalisant par le biais d'un événement central, le plus souvent un jeune homme soumis à un rite d'intégration sociale existant dans la subordination du passage de toutes les séries des situations comiques. Eugen Dîzsek (1994 : 68) a formalisé selon le modèle dramatique proposé par Greimas l'intrigue de la nouvelle comédie grecque (nea), reprise aussi par Plautus, comme un événement schéma standard où un deshénaire (D1) propulse un sujet (S) vers le trajecte de la conquête d'un objet (O) au bénéfice d'un deshénaire (D2), à l'aide d'un adjuvant (A) et faisant face à des obstacles soulevés par un ennemi (Op). Conformément à ce répertoire de rôles en six actes, le sujet est représenté par un jeune amoureux, sans élastical et sous la protection de son père, l'objet est représenté par une jeune femme, elle aussi sans élastical (une courtisane ou une vierge pauvre), l'adjuvant apparaît sous la forme de l'esclave ou de l'ami habile, l'adversaire bloque le trajecte du sujet dans le rôle du père ou bien du proxénète, et le deshénaire et le deshénaire incarnent des élastiques abstraits qui investissent le sujet soit comme élastique de défiance, soit comme élastique de satisfaction.

À la fin du trajecte inéluctable repérable dans l'intrigue de la comédie, les deux actes marginaux, le jeune amoureux et l'esclave, obtiennent pour bénéfice une intégration sociale soit sous forme de mariage, dans le cas du jeune homme, soit sous forme d'émanipation de l'esclavage, dans le cas de son adjuvant. L'objet de la recherche qui accompagne l'action dramatique à partir de l'élastique initial de désordre et jusqu'à celle de la solution finale est en fait un objet de grande valeur à double nature, matrimoniale et sociale, péculiaire et juridique. Le jeune homme obtient de l'argent pour la rançon de la jeune fille, prouvant ainsi l'ingéniosité de pouvoir acquérir un élastique.

De la transaction matrimoniale où la femme et l'argent deviennent des objets de grande valeur équivalents du point de vue fonctionnel, transforme l'espace théâtral non seulement dans un espace conventionnellement scénique, mais aussi dans une radiographie de nature juridique qui propose pour débattre le droit de la possession et de l'émanipation.

De la transaction, donc l'arrestation prend une importance dans nombre de comédies (et particulièrement chez Térence), relie par conséquent le drame scénique au cadre juridique régissant les conditions de la propriété et de la possession pour lesquelles s'affrontent le père et le fils. Pour cette raison, il faut postuler également une équivalence fonctionnelle entre le père et le leno, puisque l'un et l'autre luttent pour la préservation de leur bien et combattaient, à cette fin, le désir de possession, et donc d'émanipation, du jeune homme.

La sémiotique théâtrale confirme, par l'ensemble des schémas et des structures actuelles impliqués dans le théâtre plautinien, respectivement par les axiologies y articulées, le rapport vivant et réel avec la matrice synaxale sociale représentée dramatiquement; l'espace théâtral plautinien, formellement ordonné aux formes du théâtre populaire, propose des rituels d'intégration sociale, souvent cumulatifs la fonction esthétique avec celle éthique et instructive et souvent en faisant ainsi des pièces mises en scène des espaces fertiles de représentation sociale.

En même temps, un tel appareil esthétique rattordé pragmatiquement à la réalité, permet l'articulation d'une vision sur le social de l'angle dramaturgique, aussi bien que la compréhension de la vie quotidienne en quelque spectacle.

2. Le Prologus comme rite de passage dans le théâtre plautinien

Dispositif de frontière destiné à faire le passage de l'espace réel à celui fictionnel, le prologue de la comédie plautinienne assume sous forme attendue ou le paque de fonctions avec lequel le cadre dramatique (la fonction esthétique, religieuse et socio-juridique) est investit : il marque le passage du réel au juridique, fait allusion à l'effet de reflet du métadrame social dans un métadrame théâtral, attorde une forte instance laïque, religieuse à l'énonciation dramatique. Le Prologus comique est un discours-limite, ambivalent par excellence, qui multiplie deux spatialisés différents (extérieure et intérieure, réelle et fictionnelle) ; il représente une « limite » au sens narvallesque du mot où les frontières s'unissent ou s'inversent, ou en conservent dans ce double ambivalence l'ordre religieux du théâtre comique (la symbolique du Prologus conserve la symbolique des formes rituelles des processus divinatoires et initiatiques). Alain Deremez (1995 : 203) décrit de la manière suivante la fonction du Prologus dans le théâtre comique :

Sorc de Janus Bifrons, Prologus marque la frontière entre l'en-deçà de la théâtralité et son espace propre. Figure double aussi, il incarne la comédie dominée, telle que nous l'avons décrite, par l'action réflexive de la métaphore : il est, tout à la fois, l'auteur, le lieu où l'auteur et leur métaphore ; en lui se réunissent sans jamais vraiment se confondre, le réel et l'imaginaire, le passé et le présent, le dehors et le dedans (du théâtre), la vérité et le mensonge (de l'allégorie), sans oublier l'histoire d'une tradition (et d'un genre) et un événement singulier (la pièce). Il est l'ordonnement du masque et du poème dramatique comme signe et symbole de l'ambiguïté de ce qui va être montré et proféré.

Les différences entre le prologue plautinien et celui de Térence marquent deux étapes distinctives dans l'évolution du théâtre comique latin, l'un mettant en abîme le monde dramatique, l'autre plutôt le discours dramatique : ayant une vocation strictement narrative, d'anticipation du sujet comique, chez Plaute, le prologue a une fonction prédominante ontologique (il reflète deux mondes à la fois) ; réalisé en principe par de longs débats polémiques avec les adversaires littéraires, chez Térence, le prologue reflète les dispositifs théâtraux contemporains, il est un métadiscours théoriquement prééminent. Tout en résumant l'action dramatique, le prologue plautinien répond à une fonction esthétique qui court-circuite le processus de la réception envers l'économie de l'effort de compréhension ; celui-ci réalise pour un plus profondément un rituel divinatoire, car, tout en éludant l'action dramatique qu'il offre dès le début en résumé, l'attention est déviée vers l'effet de transe induit au spectateur, l'invocation devenant ainsi quasi religieuse, vers l'enlèvement de l'espace public profane et le transport dans un autre endroit, transposition sacré ; le sténario socio-juridique impliqué dans le spectacle comique met le spectateur, justement par ce double limite du prologue, dans la situation de juge des ébats de choses dont les données sont fixées à l'avance (le rôle proprement dit de l'auteur qui prononce le prologue est semblable à celui de l'orateur médiateur entre les parties d'un procès). La fonction poétique du prologue plautinien se dévoile justement par l'extraction de son noyau dramatique, la fable, et implicitement, par la délimitation nette entre le sujet et le rôle qui assure ainsi l'attention sur les dimensions ritualisées du spectacle théâtral.

Placé dans l'histoire du genre, entre le théâtre populaire et celui de Térence, plus élaboré, le théâtre plautinien bénéficie donc des modèles variés et complexes de la construction du prologue, à partir des formes extrêmement simples jusqu'aux formes complexes qui anticipent le prologue de Térence : ainsi, certains prologues peuvent être tenus exclusivement sur les rites énonciatifs de la captatio benevolentiae du public (comme même celui de la pièce Pseudolus), d'autres résument exclusivement l'action dramatique (v. Asinaria, Curculia, Stichus, etc.), enfin, d'autres sont composés et complexes, comme même celui de Menaechmii. Un tel prologue cumule plusieurs modèles, en faisant enchaîner les séquences de captatio benevolentiae avec les séquences médisatives, théoriques (qui sont actualisées par certains éléments de la technique théâtrale et de la polémique culturelle), respectivement avec les séquences d'anticipation, en résumé, du sujet de la pièce.

Mais, cette structure apparemment simplifiée du prologue plautinien rapportée à celui de Térence, attention, comme même note de spécificité, son caractère de « limite » discursive formellement ritualisée, plus proche d'une dimension originaire religieuse que d'une certaine pratique discursive ; il propose donc un passage direct et abrupt d'un espace à l'autre, ayant une forte portée énonciative extraordinaire.

3. Le micro-drame social : le nom propre comme insertion contrôlée dans le social

La fixation de l'identité des personnages plautiniens par l'intermédiaire du nom propre ou des catégories socio-professionnelles dévoile une problématique intimement liée aux mécanismes socio-religieux du théâtre comique, respectivement à la fonctionnement de l'espace dramatique en tant que zone de déconstruction et de reconstruction de l'ensemble social, en tant que sociogonie. Les jeux autour de l'individualisation à l'aide des noms propres de certains personnages ayant un statut social officiel bien consolidé, ou bien les dissimulations sous le masque social de certains personnages ayant un statut social marginal, ou bien la sous-triècle pour la logique de l'inversion carnavalesque, selon laquelle les positions officialisées se suspendent et se dissolvent en faveur du marginal. Étant donné que le scénario initial est déterminé par l'action comique, l'individu se détache de son rôle ou de son statut social et il qui se présente sur scène comme un simple individu profondément marqué par l'emprise du nom propre ou bien il se cache sous un masque socio-professionnel qui lui refuse l'individualisation. Ainsi, le jeune homme comme personnage principal est toujours faible et pas du tout défini du point de vue social, il est un individu masqué par un nom qui, à la fin du parcours initial, obtiendra un statut ; aussi, les pères vieillissants (une allusion au besoin du renouvellement social et du changement des générations) entre autres des rapports ambivalents avec l'identité fixée par le nom propre (ils gardent le statut qui leurs est défini, mais ils sont aussi des personnages bien individualisés et apparemment indifférents à leur propre statut) ; les proxénètes, les courtisanes, les esclaves se dissipent plus souvent sous le marquage socio-professionnel, ou bien érigent cette catégorie périphérique au rang officiel.

La définition des personnages plautiniens par le retour aux noms propres ou aux catégories détermine une problématique très subtile, et es à-dire tel le de l'insertion de l'individu dans le champ social où il se reflète où il agit le nom propre et la dénomination sociale ajustent l'identité, soit en la fixant du point de vue référentiel et en l'évaluant du point de vue sémantique (dans le sens d'une dépossession de sa signification sociale), soit en l'évaluant exclusivement du point de vue social et en lui suspendant les références. Les théories pragmatiques sur l'explicitation du nom propre, soit comme signification obtenue par l'union ensemble de descriptions définies, soit comme fixation référentielle sans le recours à aucune signification, pourraient tirer au clair cette dynamique charnavalesque des substitutions de l'individuel et du catégoriel repérable dans le théâtre plautinien ; la problématique sous-jacente pourrait être celle de la construction des identités, des dosages possibles de l'individuel, du fonctionnel et de l'actuel, du social par l'intermédiaire desquels l'identité des personnages plautiniens s'établit.

La problématique de l'attribution d'un référent aux noms propres reste un problème controversé, polarisé entre une théorie descriptiviste (celle de Russell-Frège), selon laquelle la relation avec le référent s'établit par un ensemble de traits descriptifs, respectivement la théorie causale (celle de Mill-Kripke), selon laquelle les noms propres ont un référent (fixé de manière ostensible par un baptême initial) sans avoir une signification proprement dite. La problématique de l'identité est souvent traitée celle du nom propre, car celui-ci désigne le même individu (la même identité) dans tous les mondes possibles.

La théorie descriptiviste postule que le sens d'un nom est donné par une description définie associée au nom, le sens du nom dérivant justement de la signification de cette description. Traitée comme descriptiviste abrégée, le nom propre marque sa relation avec le référent par l'intermédiaire de la signification, la théorie de la référence étant impliquée dans une théorie du sens. Reformulée sous une variante moderne (la variante Strawson-Searle), « la théorie du bouquet » (apud Devlin & Serebny, 2000 : 65) raffine la signification du nom propre l'en affirmant que certaines descriptions ont une importance plus grande que les autres et demandant au sujet parlant de faire une association fonctionnelle entre le nom et le bouquet adéquat de descriptions. La relation entre le nom et le référent s'établit par une opération d'extraction du sens selon l'importance de tel ou tel ensemble de descriptions. L'étude des descriptivistes associées et de la dénotation dévoile la problématique des noms vides et de l'opacité.

La théorie causale des noms propres postule que la fixation de la référence vise la fondation causale du nom sur l'objet le nom est introduit dans la communauté par un baptême formel ou informel, réalisé dans la présence de l'objet qui deviendra à partir de ce moment là le porteur du nom ; un témoin du baptême ayant une compétence linguistique adéquate obtient ainsi l'habileté d'utiliser le nom et de le transmettre aux générations suivantes ; les sujets absents au baptême acquièrent l'habileté de désigner l'objet par un emprunt de référence, en vertu de la chaîne causale qui unit l'objet à ceux présents au baptême. Le problème de l'emprunt de référence implique donc l'idée d'une chaîne causale par l'intermédiaire de laquelle le nom se transmet à partir du moment origininaire du baptême. Voilà pourquoi, la théorie causale simplifie la problématique du nom propre, en la libérant de la densité sémantique et en l'orientant du point de vue usuel et fonctionnel.

L'approfondissement de ces deux logiques du nom propre dans le répertoire plautinien de rôles dramatiques conduit aux conclusions sur la sémantique et la syntaxe sociale incorporées dans le nom, plus précisément sur la manière dont on réalise le rapport du nom propre à l'identité des personnages (un rapport rarefié et fonctionnel ou bien un rapport qui évoque la densité sémantique).

Comme titre d'exemple, les personnages de Pseudolus souscrivent la logique de l'inversion en ce qui concerne la mise en relief des proportions entre le corps de significations et de descriptions définies, impliqué dans l'identification des personnages, respectivement en ce qui concerne leur fixation référentielle sous la marque du nom propre ; le rôle d'intégration sociale sous-jacent au scénario dramatique articule sa dynamique toujours sous le rapport du balancement de l'identité des personnages entre le pôle purement descriptif ou référentiel. Ainsi, le personnage qui donne le titre de la pièce, Pseudolus, codifie-il par son nom un trait attributif de nature fonctionnelle (car par le recours à l'astuce et au mensonge fonctionnelle ou le paquet de stratégies avancées de la trame dramatique) ; son identité est doublement fixée, d'abord en camouflant sous la logique de la référentialité (le nom propre en langue designateur rigide) la logique descriptive du nom propre (il est un individu entré du point de vue référentiel par un nom, mais celui-ci n'est qu'un paquet de descriptions ; c'est pour cela que la première scène où Pseudolus apparaît fixe son identité de comique stratégique autour de son jeune maître, Calidorus, auquel il se dédie en tant qu'adjuvant). Le sujet antérieur dans l'itinéraire dramatique et implicitement dans le rôle d'intégration sociale, juridique et matrimonial, le jeune Calidorus, est baptisé dans sa première apparition en scène même par son adjuvant Pseudolus. Celui-ci le nomme (par le recours à l'idée d'hierarchie et de statut) lui s'adresse avec l'appellatif « maître », l'amène dans la scène et le présente, fixe son identité par un jeu de scène et un ensemble de descriptions dont le nom propre s'attribue et s'inscrit dans la position, l'est l'aveu joué autour de son maître le scénario de la dérision et il réussit ainsi à arracher graduellement toute une série de descriptions à l'aide desquelles Calidorus se définira (la sémantique de l'absence douloureuse, du chagrin provoqué par l'amour devient emblème du jeune Calidorus). En revanche, le père du jeune amoureux, Simo, se désigne lui-même (v. la scène V, l'acte I), d'abord en vérifiant son autonomie s'il entre en scène (le moment du baptême énonciatif devant le spectateur) se désignant lui-même en langue père d'un fils gaspilleur et implicitement il se définit par rapport à ses biens, à sa richesse et à son argent ; si son fils est sommé par Pseudolus à se reconnaître lui-même sous la marque de l'absence, de la privation, au contraire, son père s'expose sur la scène dramatique exclusivement par l'intermédiaire des relations de domination sociale et pécuniaire. Individualisé par un nom propre (Simo), celui-ci garde sous réserve son statut (le statut fonctionnel et dénotatif personnage uniquement de manière implicite), il joue en premier plan comme personnage simple, fixé du point de vue référentiel par son nom ; en outre sous le spectre de son statut et sous le spectre de son nom (soit dans la zone de la description, soit dans la zone de la référence), il apparaît dans la rhétorique de l'ambivalence, de l'équivoque et du versatile typiquement carnavalésque.

D'ailleurs, les personnages plautiniens, en dépeignant des rôles stéréotypés où ils apparaissent (ce qui a fait possible la réalisation des répertoires de rôles), se situent comme équation entre l'identité et le nom propre (entre leur corps sémantique et la le tr qui re \bar{c} ouvre ce Corps), par une syntaxe extrêmement mobile, soumise aux dislocations et aux inversions de toute sorte / d'un côté, la lettre des noms propres évoque des étymologies mixtes, grecques et latines, respectivement des modèles culturels hybrides et une influence italienne insèquie ; de l'autre côté, les stratégies sur la fixation du nom autour de l'identité (les modalités par lesquelles on fait le rapport du nom à l'identité, son remplissage avec une signification sociale) représentent des stratégies farnavalesques fondées sur des substitutions, des polarités, des dérivements, etc.

Ainsi, l'ample catégorie des esclaves (dont elle représente un type typique esclave Pseudolus) dispose d'identités purement fonctionnelles, leur corps sémantique s'énonce par des fonctionnalités et non pas par des mots (ils ne sont pas définis par des mots et ils ne se définissent pas eux-mêmes, mais ils se laissent définir par des fonctionnalités et des intrigues) ; individualisés le plus souvent par un nom propre (cel que D. Hrysaulus des Bacchides, Epidicus, Tranio de Mostellaria, Palestrio du Soldat fanfaron), ils se comportent selon la logique causale du nom propre, en fondant leur nom sur l'objet (sur le corps physique et sur les fonctionnalités où ils s'énoncent et durant le trajet dramatique). Dans une situation toute différente se trouve la catégorie de patrens, des pères vieux, chefs de famille (cel que Simo de Pseudolus ou Euclio de Aulularia) ; ils disposent de caractères bien formés (avares, rigides, austères), mais surtout d'un statut sur lequel ils fondent l'identité et le nom (dans leur cas il y a toujours une brèche, un espace de jeu entre l'individuel et le catégoriel). Les jeunes sont définis purement du point de vue fonctionnel, ils sont le moteur dramatique, représentent l'état de privation qui, à la fin de toute une série d'entrecroisements des situations comiques, doit être remédié (le nom propre est attribué à ce rôle dramatique faiblement défini du point de vue sémantique). Aussi, les jeunes femmes occupent dans la position d'objets de recherche sont celles le plus souvent des noms sans référence interne (leurs noms se fondent par une chaîne causale, sur une référence empruntée dont on a connaissance justement par certaines références émises par d'autres personnages) et surtout sans une structure sémantique propre. Réduits aux rôles fonctionnels, le soldat fanfaron, l'usurier, le marchand de curiosités (leno) miment une identité sociale, tout comme la représentation de leur catégorie, de la position marginale d'une pseudo-position officielle, évoque le faux, l'imitation et le transitoire ; ils imposent de faux devoirs aux jeunes et aux curiosités, ils renversent les hiérarchies et l'ordre pétauinaire, conseillant les jeunes de voler leurs pères et les curiosités de se vendre plusieurs fois (ils bouleversent l'ordre pétauinaire tout comme les esclaves stratégiques bouleversent la logique de l'hierarchie).

Vu en ensemble, le répertoire des rôles dramatiques plautiniens définit non seulement certaines typologies de relevances sociales, mais, étant interrogé du point de vue de la construction des identités par le rapport du nom propre, il dévoile des paquets cohérents de stratégies sur l'insertion du nom propre dans l'ordre social, résultant du point de vue farnavalesque. L'option pour la logique descriptive du nom propre ou pour celle causale simplifiée dans la création de l'identité fictive des personnages devient pertinente pour ce qui est de l'illustration des mécanismes et de la dynamique interne du micro-drame social dans le théâtre plautin ; le jeu subtil entre l'ensemble des stratégies descriptives et le nom est un indice de la solidité du corps social représenté typologiquement.

par les personnages, respectivement de la fonction de la syntaxe sociale représentée justement par la brèche de l'insertion de l'individu dans le champ social.

Leading a life without any solutions is the author's prelude for self-discovery and personal development. A 104-year-old Zen Buddhist nun sheds an unexpected light on the protagonist's gloomy and subdued despair existence. Nao, a Japanese-American troubled adolescent, starts writing a diary in order to get a grasp of her life and to come to terms with her present. While readers are immersing themselves in A Tale for the Time Being, they are bound to draw parallels between Ruth Ozeki's work and a Bildungsroman principles.

The narrative unravels on a multi-layered life approach basis, splitting hairs and tackling sensitive issues like culture clashes between American and Japanese values, life's frailty, the choice to surrender to life's hazardous slips and whimsical shifts, the individual's alienation enabled by a rapidly changing society.

KEYWORDS: realism, struggling for survival, adjusting to the present, growing mature, suffering, intricate healing processes

1. Introduction

Why Ruth Ozeki's work? Maybe because it is a novel that seems to remove barriers, grasping the rhythm of life and turning it into intangibles. It is a novel-confession, with spatial and temporal levels, permanently interwoven as if they triggered a whole whirl of feelings and emotions. A Tale for the Time Being also stands for a writing on introspection and self-discovery, where a pervasive thematic projection renders in a rather recurrent manner the transitional movement from white to black, therefore from hope to despondency.

And though we know from time immemorial, or as the old Latin saying goes *vanitas vanitatum et omnia vanitas*¹, despair together with *taedium vitae*² cannot possibly make for an appropriate *modus vivendi*³. For this reason, we see that in A Tale for the Time Being, Ruth Ozeki depicts Nao to us as somebody who after being defeated by everyone except her fate: est tanti ab omnibus vinci, dum a me fortuna vincatur.

A novel of illusions forged by our modern world, completely enslaved by mercantilism; also a novel of disillusion brought about by an alienated society. The mystery wraps up Ruth's discovery of a breathtaking diary, meant to build unthinkable bridges, over time, between Asia and Canada, between her and a 16-year-old Japanese girl, named Naoko Yasuani. It's Nao's diary, therefore everything is revolving mostly around Nao. So, who is Nao? Is she a secluded adolescent with a topsy-turvy life, in sore need of a life-saver, as she doesn't see any fine prospects before her, having incurred all her classmates' hatred and neglecting a moment's respite thanks to a father, tormented by remorse, who is definitely well-grounded in suicidal anxiety? Unfortunately, she is all that.

It stands to reason that Ruth Ozeki's readership witnesses Nao's indefatigable quest for a genuine self. Nao's adolescent dreams are unexpectedly turned to ashes, without her having the willingness to strike back. The agonizing process of adjustment to the harshness of a cultural pattern to which she doesn't truly belong is vividly described in the novel. Readers can't be but deeply sympathetic to her cause, to her physical, mental, and spiritual journey.

Engrossed in Ruth Ozeki's reverberating novel, we are bound to discover destinies on the verge of annihilation, seduced by the suicide liberating force. We also glimpse the attempt to re-spiritualize those human beings, left to drift having been profoundly challenged by either a cross-cultural clash or a whimsical economy.

As matters stand, the searing pain Nao is enduring enables her to gradually become aware of an unsuspected inner strength. As the story line unfolds, we are to see that the journey Nao has embarked on is not entirely sheer madness, without anybody who might mean well and the passing of time, devoid of any sense of balance and proportion.

1.1. Writing, a profession of faith

To Japanese-American author, Ruth Ozeki, writing is of primary importance as it allows her to collect those things that have caught her interest, be they stories, impressions, or scenes. Moreover, she wholeheartedly admits that both writing and meditation stand for that type of means she resorts to in order to get a grasp of how life touches a string in her heart. In all likelihood, sharing with her readers what she feels about writing, generally and words, particularly sheds a light on the very process of solving the puzzle of her novel.

The reason that I write and the reason that I made films, the reason that I've done all of this kind of stuff is that I love collecting things. I'm a collector. When you write that's what you do: you walk around and collect stories, impressions, and scenes. Everything becomes potential material, and it really changes the way that you interact with your life. In that sense, it's really quite an acquisitive relationship with the stuff that I pass through. Whether I'm acquiring that visually or as text files, it's pretty much the same kind of process⁴.

Fiction is an element for that that has the power to shape reality in its own image or images, I should say, because reality, like light, exists not only as a single point or particle, but also as an array of possibilities.

This is what happens when I'm writing well: I feel better. Writing is one of the means I have available to feel. Meditation is another. Put another way, writing and meditation are practices that allow me to feel my feelings. Otherwise, how would I know? "We are what we tell ourselves we are," says my friend and teacher, Norman Fisher. "Language-making is not incidental or ornamental to human consciousness; it is its center, its essence. No language, no person. No relationships, no tools... Meditation practice brings the mind to a profound quiet that comes very close to the realm of consciousness, and right there is the wellspring where language bubbles up." I'm hopelessly drawn to this wellspring. I sit on my cushion or at my computer, alert, eyes half shut, listening in to that profound quiet. I seem to be waiting. How am I waiting? Hopelessly (because hope can be frustrating), and yet furiously, too. Trying to cultivate some patience and trust. Drawn by a longing to be fully who I am, whatever that may be. What am I waiting for? Words. Or the world. No, that's not quite right because this is an intransitive kind of waiting, with no object.

An interview⁶ with A Tale for the Time Being's author, the Japanese-American writer Ruth Ozeki⁷, can be very revealing about its genesis. Who else would we deem right to provide such fascinating insights into the art of writing this novel if not the author herself? In what follows, which is mostly the entire reproduction of the interview, we are to find out why Ruth Ozeki has written herself into her novel as the character Ruth, how she feels about Japanese culture and which are the most relevant topics in the novel that prompt readers' reflection.

Ruth Ozeki: Then the earthquake in Japan happened, followed by the tsunami and followed by the meltdown at Fukushima. And suddenly, when I was watching all of that unfold, I realized that Japan certainly would never be the same and that the book that I had written was no longer relevant.

Rachel Marín: So, Ruth Ozeki reworked her novel. It's called "A Tale for the Time Being." She wanted to acknowledge the disaster in Japan. She also wanted a second character, someone who would discover Nao's diary sometime in the future after it had washed up on the shores of British Columbia.

Ruth Ozeki: As it turned out, that person ended up being a character named Ruth, who bears more than a superficial resemblance to me.

Rachel Marín: Why did you make that decision? You could have come up with any number of other characters to kind of play off Nao. Why did you decide to make it autobiographical that way?

Ruth Ozeki: It was an idea I had when I first started, and I rejected it promptly. It seemed like a terrible idea at the time. And so I proceeded to audition about four or five other characters to play the role of Nao's reader. And I realized that if I could, you know, sort of step back and take the book apart and put myself in there as a character then I would be able to incorporate the tsunami, the earthquake and the issues that arose into the book in a kind of a more considered and serious way. And so that's what I did.

Rachel Marín: In some ways, Ruth and Nao are kind of mirror images of one another. I'm wondering if there was something in her life that did reflect your own experience with culture shock, culture clash. You write about how Nao spent some formative years in California, in Northern California, and she returns to Japan feeling very much like an outsider, even though she is Japanese.

Ru.h Ozeki: She's ethnically Japanese, but she herself was raised in Sunnyvale, California. And so she feels very much like an American kid. You know, her father loses his job. The family is forced to move back to Japan. She's put into a junior high school where she knows none of the social codes. She speaks Japanese, but not with the same fluency as her classmates certainly. And so she is bullied as a result of that. In the U.S., I remember, you know, when I was little I was always looked at as, you know, the Japanese kid or the Asian kid. And, you know, I did experience some bullying, especially when I was in California.

Ra.h el Mar.ın: But the kind of bullying you describe in the story is really intense. It's very harrowing.

Ru.h Ozeki: Yes.

Ra.h el Mar.ın: Some of the bullying is frankly too graphic to describe. But can you give us a sense of the level of isolation that Nao feels as a result of this bullying? What happens to her?

Ru.h Ozeki: One of the things that was, you know, that was devastating to her was when all of her classmates pretended that she no longer existed. They just ceased to see her. And so she became a non-person to them. She became a ghost. You know, that...

Ra.h el Mar.ın: To the point where they actually held a funeral for her.

Ru.h Ozeki: That's right. They held a funeral for her. And these are stories that I've, you know, that I have read. For Nao, this was a real struggle. I mean, that book is called "A Tale for the Time Being." And, you know, Nao was really struggling with being a being. You know, she had been turned into a non-being by her classmates. The one person in her life who is a source of stability for her, however, is her 104-year-old great-grandmother, old Jiko, who is a Zen Buddhist nun. Her great-grandmother, old Jiko, teaches her to meditate, you know, just sitting with all of the powerful feelings and emotions and conditions of her life⁸. You know, in the book, it's couched in a funny kind of way because old Jiko calls it her superpower. You know, but it does turn into the source of her strength, I think, and her patience.

Ra.h el Mar.ın: There's a heavy theme of suicide in this story. Nao is dealing with severe depression and kind of a preoccupation with suicide. But she has it in her DNA. Her father is suffering profoundly from a sense of despondency. And turns out she has a great-uncle who was a kamikaze pilot in World War II who killed himself. [...]

2. Unravelling the mystery

To secure her object of bidding life farewell, Nao has first to give expression to her feelings and prevent her great-grandmother's image from sinking into oblivion.

It's not what you think, since my purpose for writing it before I die is to tell someone the fascinating life story of my hundred-and-four-year-old great-grandmother, who is a Zen Buddhist nun.

You probably don't think nuns are all fascinating, but my great-grandmother is, and not in a kinky way at all. [...]

This diary will tell the real life story of my great-grandmother Yasuani Jiko. She was a nun and a novelist and a New Woman of the Taisho era.

(Ozeki, 2013)⁹

As far as Nao's writing is concerned, it definitely sets our curiosity agog, striking us as a fresh way to let the cat loose of the bag:

I think it's important to have clearly defined goals in life, don't you? Especially if you don't have a lot of life left. Because if you don't have clear goals, you might run out of time, and when the day comes, you'll find yourself standing on the parapet of a tall building, or sitting on your bed with a box of pills in your hand, thinking, Shit! I blew it. If only I'd set clearer goals for myself!

(Ozeki, 2013)

Overwhelmed by a strong feeling of emptiness, Nao attaches great importance to her failures, despite being merely sixteen-year-old:

I'm telling you this because I'm actually not going to be around for long, and you might as well know this up front so you don't make assumptions. Assumptions suck. They're like expectations. Assumptions and expectations will kill any relationship, so let's you and me not go there, okay? The truth is that very soon I'm going to graduate from time, or maybe I shouldn't say graduate because that makes it sound as if I've actually met my goals and deserve to move on, when the fact is that I just turned sixteen and I've accomplished nothing at all. Zilch. Nada. Do I sound pathetic? I don't mean to. I just want to be accurate. Maybe instead of graduate, I should say I'm going to drop out of time. Drop out. Time out. Existence. I'm counting the moments.

Ruth discovers a Hello Kitty lunchbox, washed up on the shore of her beach home.

A tiny sparkle caught Ruth's eye, a small glint of refracted sunlight angling out from beneath a massive angle of drying bull kelp, which the sea had heaved up onto the sand and fill it. She mistook it for the sheen of a dying jellyfish and almost walked right by it. The beaches were overrun with jellyfish these days, the monstrous red stinging kind that looked like wounds along the shoreline. But something made her stop. She leaned over and nudged the heap of kelp with the toe of her sneaker then poked it with a stick. Unangling the whiplike fronds, she dislodged enough to see that what glistened underneath was not a dying sea jelly, but something plastic, a bag. Not surprising. The ocean was full of plastic. She dug a bit more until she could lift the bag up by its corner. It was heavier than she expected, a starred plastic freezer bag, crusted with barnacles that spread across its surface like a rash. It must have been in the ocean for a long time, she thought. Inside the bag, she could see a hint of something red, someone's garbage, no doubt tossed overboard or left behind after a picnic or a rave. The sea was always heaving things up and hurling them back: fishing lines, floats, beer cans, plastic toys [...], Nike sneakers. A few years earlier it was severed feet. People were finding them up and down Vancouver Island, washed up on the sand. One had been found on this very beach. No one could explain what had happened to the rest of the bodies. Ruth didn't want to think about what might be rotting inside the bag. She flung it farther up the beach. She would finish her walk and then pick it up on the way back, take it home, and throw it out.

Oliver, Ruth's husband, who thoroughly makes the inventory of the barnacle-encrusted freezer bag, washed up on the beach and brought home by her.

He had smoothed the bags flat, laid them out on top of one another in descending order of size, and then sorted the contents into three neat collections: a small stack of handwritten letters; a pudgy bound book with a faded red cover; a sturdy antique wristwatch with a matte black face and a luminous dial. Next to these sat the Hello Kitty lunchbox that had protected the contents from the corrosive effects of the sea. The cat was sniffing at the lunchbox. Ruth picked him up and dropped him on the floor, and then turned her attention to the items on the table.

Missing the hustle and bustle of a metropolis, marooned on a remote island in Desolation Sound, trapped in a fictional world of her own creation, and unable to get away as the writer herself acknowledges, Ruth, the character, a sort of doppelgänger, makes sure she has a library home, hoping to keep up with the times despite leading a secluded life.

They liked books, all books, but especially old ones, and their house was overflowing with them. There were books everywhere, stacked on shelves and piled on the floor, on chairs, on the stairway reads, but neither Ruth nor Oliver minded. Ruth was a novelist, and novelists, Oliver asserted, should have cats and books. And indeed, buying books was her consolation for moving to a remote island in the middle of Desolation Sound, where the public library was one small humid room above the community hall, overrun with children. In addition to the extensive and dog-eared juvenile literature section and some popular adult titles, the library's collection seemed largely to comprise books on gardening, canning, food security, alternative energy, alternative healing, and alternative schooling. Ruth missed the abundance and diversity of urban libraries, their quiet patios, and when she and Oliver moved to the small island, they agreed that she should be able to order any book she wanted, which she did. Research, she found, although in the end he'd read most of them, while she'd read only a few. She just liked having them around. Recently, however, she had started to notice that the damp sea air had swollen their pages and the silver fish had taken up residence in their spines. When she opened the covers, they smelled of mold. This made her sad.

The bag contains, among other things, a surprising copy of Proust's "In Search of Lost Time". But Proust's book is no more than a cover. Inside is Nao's diary, written in purple ink.

'In search of lost time', she said, translating the vanished gilt-leaf-embossed on the red cloth spine. "I've never read it"

"I haven't either," said Oliver. "I don't think I'll be trying it in French, though."

"Mm," she said, agreeing, but then she opened the cover, anyway, curious to see if she could understand just the first few lines. She was expecting to see an age-stained folio, printed in an antique font, so she was entirely unprepared for the adolescent purple handwriting had sprawled across the page. It felt like a description, and it shocked her so much she almost dropped the book.”

(Ozeki, 2013)

As the novel unfolds, Ruth reads the diary and develops a bond with Nao. As a matter of fact, she speculates up a lō on Nao's personality and fate, staring with her handwriting that may possibly throw a light on the events. With every turn of the page, Ruth is sucked deeper into an enchanting mystery.

Print is predictable and impersonal, conveying information in a mechanical transaction with the reader's eye. Handwriting, by contrast, resists the eye, reveals its meaning slowly, and is as intimate as skin.

Ruth stared at the page. The purple words were mostly in English, with some Japanese characters scattered here and there, but her eye wasn't really taking in their meaning as much as a feel-sense, murky and emotional, of the writer's presence. The fingers that had gripped the purple gel ink pen must have belonged to a girl, a teenager. Her handwriting, these loopy purple marks impressed on the page, retained her moods and anxieties, and the moment Ruth laid eyes on the page, she knew without a doubt that the girl's fingertips were pink and moist and that she had bitten her nails down to the quick.

Nao's great-grandmother, a 104-year-old or so Zen Buddhist nun wouldn't be very interested in finding out about the tumultuous life in Tokyo, would she? Yet, contrary to all expectation, she displays a great enthusiasm for every Tokyo-related piece of information. Therefore, Nao has gone into the habit of updating Jiko on modern life, on its cultural trends and news items. As a Zen Buddhist nun, old Jiko is praying a lot for all beings who are suffering in the world, hoping to save them.

My old Jiko really likes it when I tell her lots of details about modern life. She doesn't get out very much anymore because she lives in a temple in the mountains in the middle of nowhere and has renounced the world and also there's the fact of her being a hundred and four years old. I keep saying that's her age, but actually I'm just guessing. We don't really know, for sure, how old she is, and she claims she doesn't remember, either.

And as I was saying, my old Jiko really likes detail, and she likes it when I tell her about the little sounds and smells and colours and lights and advertising and people and fashions and newspaper headlines that make up the noisy ocean of Tokyo, which is why I've trained myself to notice and remember. I tell her everything, about cultural trends and news items I read about high school girls who get raped and suffocated with plastic bags in love hotels. You can tell Granny all that kind of stuff and she doesn't mind. I don't mean it makes her happy. She's not a hentai. But she understands that shit happens, and she just sits there and listens and nods her head and counts the beads on her juzu, saying blessings for those poor high school girls and the perverts and all the beings who are suffering in the world. She's a nun, so that's her job. I swear, sometimes I think the main reason she's still alive is because of all the stuff I give her to pray about.

I asked her once why she liked to hear stories like this, and she explained to me that when she got ordained, she shaved her head and took some vows to be a *bosatsu*¹⁰. One of her vows was to save all beings, which basically means that she agreed not to become enlightened until all the other beings in this world get enlightened first. It's kind of like letting everybody else get in to the elevator ahead of you. When you calculate all the beings on this earth at any time, and then add in the ones that are getting born every second and the ones that have already died- and not just human beings, either, but all the animals and other life-forms like amoebas and viruses and maybe even plants that have ever lived or ever will live, as well as all the extinct species- well, you can see that enlightenment will take a very long time. And what if the elevator gets full and the doors slam shut and you're still standing outside?

Nao holds old Jiko in great regard for everything her great-grandmother embodies. For instance, old Jiko has been very careful about keeping her spirit alive, cherishing life and wisely accepting its unpredictability. A sharp-witted person, our 104-year-old Zen Buddhist nun impresses us as she never runs a wild-goose chase. At the same time, we get the chance to see that her great-granddaughter usually speaks her mind, having quite a smooth tongue. Beyond doubt, old Jiko is somebody, and there are plenty of inspirational pages which stem from Nao looking to Jiko for guidance.

Old Jiko is super careful with her time. She does everything really, really slowly, even when she's just sitting on the veranda, looking out at the dragonflies spinning lazily around the garden pond. She says that she does everything really, really slowly in order to spread time out so that she'll have more of it and live longer, and then she laughs so you know she is telling you a joke. I mean, she understands perfectly well that time isn't something you can spread out like butter or jam, and death isn't going to hang around and wait for you to finish whatever you happen to be doing before it zaps you. That's the joke, and she laughs because she knows it.

It's Nao's sincerity and unsophisticated manner of writing that mostly appeal to us, the readers. She is very much attached to her great-grandmother, whom she loves dearly.

I don't mind thinking of the world without me because I'm unexceptional, but I hate the idea of the world without old Jiko. She's totally unique and special, like the last Galapagos tortoise or some other ancient animal hobbling around on the scorched earth, who is the only one left of its kind. But please don't get me going on the topic of species extinction because it's totally depressing, and I'll have a total suicide right this second.

Nao chooses not to indulge in illusions when it comes to the people who might be interested to read about Jiko. Then, why write at all about her? Recently, Nao has also broken the spell of giving utterance to her feelings on a blog, realizing that nobody makes common cause with somebody else but himself.

Okay, Nao. Why are you doing this? Like, what's the point?

This is a problem. The only reason I can think of for writing Jiko's life story in this book is because I love her and want to remember her, but I'm not planning on sticking around for long, and I can't remember her stories if I'm dead, right? And apart from me, who else would care? I mean, if I thought the world would want to know about old Jiko, I'd post her stories on a blog but actually I stopped doing that a while ago. It made me sad when I caught myself pretending that everybody out there in cyberspace cared about what I thought, when really nobody gives a shit. And when I multiplied that sad feeling by all the millions of people in their lonely bedrooms, furiously writing and posting to their lonely laptops, that nobody has time to read because they're all so busy writing and posting, it kind of broke my heart.

How inspiring has proved to be to Nao her great-grandmother's life? Seemingly, particularly inspiring to the point of making Nao sink in to thoughts about her great-grandmother, and devoting herself entirely to immortalize old Jiko through a collection of recollections in an emotional diary.

The fact is, I don't have much of a special network these days, and the people I hang out with aren't the kind who care about a hundred- and four-year-old Buddhist nun even if she is a bosa'u who can use e-mail and texting, and that's only because I made her buy a computer so she could stay in touch with me when I'm in Tokyo and she's at her falling-down old temple on a mountain in the middle of nowhere. She's not crazy about new technology, but she does pretty well for a time being with characters and archaisms in both her thumbs. Old Jiko and Marcel Proust to me from a prewired world, which is a time that's sadly lost these days.

So here, I am at Fifi's Lonely Apron, staring at all these blank pages and asking myself why I'm bothering, when suddenly an amazing idea knocks me over. Ready? Here it is: I will write down everything I know about Jiko's life in Marcel's book, and when I'm done, I'll just leave it somewhere, and you will find it!

How cool is that? It feels like I'm reaching forward through time to touch you, and now that you've found it, you're reaching back to touch me!

If you ask me, it's fantastically cool and beautiful. It's like a message in a bottle cast out on the ocean of time and space. Totally personal, and real, too, right? Out of old Jiko's and Marcel's prewired world. It's the opposite of a blog. It's an aBlog, because it's meant for only one special person, and that person is you. And if you've read this far, you probably understand what I mean. Do you feel special yet?

I'll just wait here for a while to see if you answer...

(Ozeki, 2013)

At first, Ruth is less than confident in Nao's skills as a kind of writer, questioning whether the diary rescued from the shore is worthy of any consideration on her behalf. Ruth also acknowledges the fact that she needs to prioritize as her own writing endeavours haven't successfully materialized yet.

Ruth looked at the sturdy red book with its worn, gilded embossed on the cover. It was lying on top of a tall messy stack of notes and manuscript pages, bristling with Post-its, and wound with cramped marginalia, which represented the memoir that she'd been working on for a decade.

À la recherche du temps perdu, indeed. Unable to complete another novel, she had decided instead to write about the years she had spent taking care of her mother who'd suffered from Alzheimer's. Now, looking at the pile of pages, she felt a quickening flush of panic at the thought of all her own lost time, the confused mess she'd made of this draft, and the work that still needed to be done. What was she doing wasting precious hours on someone else's story?

She picked up the diary and, using the side of her thumb, started riffling through the pages. She wasn't reading, in fact she was trying not to. She only wanted to ascertain whether the handwriting continued all the way to the end, or if it petered out halfway through. How many diaries and journals had she herself started and then abandoned? How many abandoned novels languished in folders on her hard drive? But to her surprise, although the colour of the ink occasionally bled from purple to pink to black to blue and back to purple again, the writing itself never faltered, growing smaller and if anything even denser, straight through to the very last, highly packed page. The girl had run out of paper before she ran out of words.

And then?

Ruth snapped the book shut and closed her eyes for good measure to keep herself from cheating and reading the final sentence, but the question lingered, floating like a residual burn in the darkness of her mind: What happens in the end?"

(Ozeki, 2013)

In view of Nao's cursive writing, short of a mass of corrections, or an avalanche of rephrasing, Ruth has to admit that though there is an overall impression of on-the-spur-of-the-moment expression, what comes across in Nao's diary is by no means senseless.

Running her fingertips across the soft cloth cover, she noted the faint impression of the vanished letters. They still retained the shape of À la recherche du temps perdu, but they had evolved - no, the word implied a gradual unfolding, and this was sudden, a mutation or a rifled pages ripped from their cover by some Tokyo craftsman who'd retooled Proust into something altogether new.

In her mind's eye, she could see the purple ink striping sinuous lines into solid blocks of coloured paragraphs. She couldn't help but notice and admire the uninhibited flow of the girl's language. Rarely had she stumbled to second thoughts. Rarely did she doubt a word, or pause to consider or replace it with another. There were only a few crossed-out lines and phrases, and this, too, filled Ruth with something like awe. It had been years since she'd approached the page with such certainty.

I am reaching through time to touch you."

(Ozeki, 2013)

*Ex abrupto*¹¹, Nao's life is turned upside down. Almost everything she is familiar with has vanished into thin air: the company where her father was working has gone bankrupt, irreparably shaking his family financial situation; furthermore, in the wake of such a dramatic shift in their social status, Nao has to cope with another overnight change, meaning that of trading the American life-style (education system included) for the Japanese one. To add the last straw, they are left with no savings, as a result of her father's not very inspired financial investments.

Timing is everything. Somewhere I read that men born between April and June are more likely to commit suicide¹² than men born at other times of the year. My dad was born in May, so maybe that explains it. No, that's not what he's succeeded in killing himself yet. He hasn't. But he's still dying. It's just a matter of time.

I know I said I would write about old Jiko, but my dad and I are having a fight and so I'm kind of preoccupied. It's not really a huge fight but we're not talking to each other, which actually means that I'm not talking to him. He probably hasn't even noticed because he's pretty oblivious to other people's feelings these days, and I don't want to upset him by telling him, "Hey Dad, in case you hadn't noticed, we're having a fight, okay?" He's got a lot on his mind and I don't want to make him even more depressed.

What we're not really fighting about is me not really going to school. The problem is that I screwed up my high school entrance exams, so I can't go in anywhere good, so my only option is to go to some kind of trade school where the stupid kids go, which is so not an option. I don't particularly care about getting an education. I'd much rather become a nun and go live with old Jiko at her temple on the mountain, but my mom and dad say I have to graduate from high school first.

So right now, I'm a ronin, which is an old word for a samurai warrior who doesn't have a master. Back in feudal times, samurai warriors had to have lords or masters. The whole point of being a samurai was to serve a master, and when your master got killed or committed seppuku or lost his status in a war or something, that was it. Snap! Your raison d'être was gone, and you had to become a ronin and wander around having sword fights and getting into trouble. These ronin were scary dudes, kind of like what the homeless guys living under bridges in Ueno Park might turn into if you gave them really sharp swords.

Obviously, I'm not a samurai warrior, and nowadays ronin just means a dummy who screws up her entrance exams and has to take extra classes at a school and study at home while she works up enough enthusiasm and self-confidence to take the tests again. Usually ronin have graduated from high school and are living with their parents while they try to get into university. It's pretty unusual to be a junior high school ronin like me, but I'm old for my grade, and actually now that I'm sixteen, I don't have to go to school if I don't want to. That's what the law says, anyways.

The way you write ronin is [...] with the character for wave and the character for person, which is pretty much how I feel, like a little wave person, floating around on the stormy sea of life.

Obviously, Nao gives expression to her feelings in a rather natural, unpretentious way, managing to catch our attention as if she talked to us, as if she unburdened her sorrows to us. Having been raised as an American teenager, going back to Japan and becoming immersed in an unfamiliar culture lead her to gradually sink into a quagmire of angst, solitude, and violence.

It's really not my fault that I screwed up my entrance exams. With my educational background, I couldn't get into a good Japanese school no matter how much I crammed. My dad wants me to go to Canada. He's got this thing about Canada. He says it's like America only with health care and no guns, and you can live up to your potential here and not have to worry about what society thinks or about getting sick or getting shot I told him no way to sweat it because I already don't give a rat's ass what society thinks, and I don't have enough potential to waste time worrying about it. He's right about the getting – sick or getting – shot part though. I'm pretty healthy and I don't mind the idea of dying, but I also don't want to get mowed down by some freaky high school kid in a trench coat who's high on Zoloft and has traded in his Xbox for a semiautomatic.

My dad used to be in love with America. I'm not kidding. It was like America was his lover, and he loved her so much that I swear Mom was jealous. We used to live here, in a town called Sunnyvale, which is in California. My dad used to be his home computer programmer, and he was headhunted when I was three and got his great job in Silicon Valley, and we all moved there. My mom wasn't thrilled, but back then she went along with anything Dad said, and as for me, I don't have any memory of Japan from when I was a baby. As far as I'm concerned, my whole life started and ended in Sunnyvale, which makes me American.

Mom says I didn't speak any English at first but they stuck me in daycare with a nice lady named Mrs. Delgado, and I look back like a fish now. That's just the way kids are. My mom had a tougher time. She never got the hang of English or made many friends, but she was okay with it because Dad was making tons of money and she could buy really nice clothes. So, everything was great and we were just cruising along, except for the fact that we were living in a total dreamland called the Dream. Bubble, and when it burst Dad's company went bankrupt and he got sacked, and we lost our visas and had to come back to Japan, which totally sucked because not only did Dad not have a job, but he'd also taken a big percentage of his big fat salary in stock options so suddenly we didn't have any savings either, and Tokyo's not cheap. It was a complete bust and Dad was sulking around like a jilted lover, and Mom was grim and tight and righteous, but at least they identified as Japanese and still spoke the language fluently. I, on the other hand, was totally fucked, because I identified as American, and even though we always spoke Japanese at home, my conversational skills were limited to basic, daily-life stuff like where's my allowance, and pass the jam, and Oh please please please don't make me leave Sunnyvale.

In Japan, they have special private catch-up schools for kikokushijo kids like me, who get behind in their schoolwork after spending a bunch of years as stupid American schools while their dads are on company assignments, and then have to catch up with their Japanese grade level when their dads get transferred back. Only my dad wasn't on a company assignment and he wasn't getting transferred back. He got laid off. And it wasn't like I'd go behind my grade level- I'd only ever been to American schools, so I'd never not been behind. And my parents couldn't afford a fancy private catch-up school, so they ended up sticking me in a public junior high school.

What has Nao ever done to bring her colleagues' contempt upon herself? Well, nothing at all. They have just chosen to bear Nao a grudge as persistently as possible, without sparing any effort whatsoever to give her hell on a daily basis. Consequently, Nao is over head and ears in work, trying to get a moment's respite from such a hostile environment. She doesn't seem to be shilly-shallying between flashing back defiance and enduring everything as it is obvious that she has the haphazard odds stacked against her.

We were totally lying, but it was okay, and we walked the rest of the way not saying anything, because if we even opened our mouths after telling such big lies, the truth might come pouring out so we had to keep our lips shut. But even if we couldn't talk frankly to each other, I still liked it. My Dad walked me to school every morning, because I mean, the kids couldn't stare at picking on me until after he'd waved goodbye and turned the corner.

But they were waiting. I could feel their eyes on us as we stood by the gate, and the hairs on my arms and the back of my neck started to prickle, and my heart started beating real fast, and my arms were like rivers flooding. I wanted to cling to my dad and beg him not to go, but I knew I couldn't do that.

"Ja, ne," my dad would say, brightly. "Study hard, okay?"

And I'd just nod because I knew that if I tried to speak I would start crying. The minute he turned his back, they would start to move in. Have you ever seen those nature documentaries where they show a pack of wild hyenas moving in to kill a wildebeest or a baby gazelle? They come in from all sides and they start to attack the animal off from the herd and surround it, getting closer and closer and staying real high, and if Dad had happened to turn around to wave to me, it would have looked like good-natured fun, like I had lots of fun friends, gathering around me, singing out greetings in terrible English – Guddo moningu, dear Transfer Student Yasutani! Hello! Hello! – and Dad would have been reassured to see me so popular and everyone making an effort to be nice to me. And it's usually one hyena, not always the biggest one, but one that's small and quick and mean, who lunges first, breaking flesh and drawing blood, which is the signal for the rest of the pack to attack, so that by the time we go through the doors of the school, I was usually covered with fresh cuts and pinching bruises and my uniform was all unbuttoned with new little scars in it made by the sharp point of nail scissors that the girls kept in their pencil cases to trim their splinters. Hyenas don't kill their prey. They cripple them and then eat them alive. Basically, it went on like that all day¹³. They would walk by my desk and pretend to gag or sniff the air and say *Iyada! Gaijin kusai!*¹⁴ or *Bimbo kusai!*¹⁵ Sometimes they practiced their idiomatic English on me, repeating stuff they learned from American rap lyrics [...] You get the idea. My strategy was basically just to ignore them or play dead or pretend I didn't exist. I thought that maybe if I just pretended hard enough it would actually come true, and I would either die or disappear. Or at least it would come true enough for my classmates to believe it and stop tormenting me, but they didn't. They didn't stop until they'd chased me home to our apartment and I ran up the stairs and locked the door behind me, panting and bleeding from lots of little places like under my arms or between my legs where the cuts wouldn't show.

We can't be but impressed with such determination that Nao's zealous colleagues don't fail to display when it comes to make her feel at ease. To reach their aim, they even put on a mock funeral for the transferred student Yasutani Naoko, leaving nothing to accident, attending to the most insignificant detail of the event. Beyond any doubt, arranging the mock funeral hasn't been any trifling work; suffice it to say that they are really committed to let Nao understand to what extent they truly appreciate her and cherish her presence among them.

My funeral was beautiful and very real¹⁶. All the kids in my class were wearing black armbands, and they had a lantern altar on my desk with a candle and an incense burner and my school photograph, enlarged and framed and decorated with black and white ribbons. One by one my enemies took turns going up to my desk and paying their respects, laying a white paper flower in front of my picture, while the rest of the class stood at their desks with their hands clasped and their eyes fixed on the ground. Maybe they were trying not to laugh, but I don't think so. The atmosphere was very solemn and it felt like a proper funeral. Daisuke-kun was pale when his turn came to go up, but he did it, and he offered his flower and bowed deeply, and I almost felt proud of him, which I know sounds kind of perverse but I think maybe you get a little fond of the people you've wronged and whose future you've owned.

The whole time they were doing this, Ugawa Sensei was chanting a Buddhist hymn. I didn't really grieve until the time because I grew up in Sunnyvale and didn't have much exposure yet to the Buddhist tradition, but later on, when I heard it again at my old Jiko's temple, I asked her about it. She told me it's called the Maka Hanyu Harami Shingyo, which means something like the Great Most Excellent Wisdom Heart Sutra. The only part I remember goes like this:

Shiki fu i ku, ku fu i shiki.

It's pretty abstract. Old Jiko tried to explain it to me, and I don't know if I understood it correctly or not, but I think it means that nothing in the world is solid or real, because nothing is permanent and all things - including trees and animals and pebbles and mountains and rivers and even me and you - are just kind of flowing through for the time being. I think that's true, and it's very reassuring, and I just wish I'd understood that at my funeral when Ugawa Sensei was chanting because it would have been a great comfort to me, but of course I didn't because these sutras are in an old-fashioned language that nobody understands anymore, unless you're like Jiko and it's your job. But actually it doesn't really matter because even if you can't exactly understand the words, you know they are beautiful and profound, and Ugawa Sensei's voice, which was usually so mumbly and unpleasant was suddenly so soft and sad and gentle, and he was chanting with feeling, like he really meant it. When he walked up to my desk to offer me a flower, the look on his face made me want to cry because it was so wisened up and full of his own particular sorrow. A couple of times I actually did cry - like when I saw my portrait hung with the black and white funeral ribbons, and when I saw how respectful my classmates were being to me, with their bowed heads and their paper flowers. They must have all gotten together in clubs after school to make those flowers and decorate my picture. They were so serious and dignified I almost loved them.

(Ozeki, 2013)

It is really very fortunate that Nao can find solace in her great-grandmother's wisdoms when her misery and despair reach the climax; old Jiko's teachings are definitely met with great enthusiasm and receptiveness as company in distress makes trouble less.

It is equally true that *nisi pe te sapias, frustra sapientem audias*¹⁷. Consequently, being a gifted person, somebody capable to tell the good from the bad, Nao eventually succeeds in siding with a 104-year-old Zen Buddhist nun.

My old Jiko says that everything happens because of your karma which is a kind of subtle energy that you cause by the stuff you do or say or even just think, which means you have to wash yourself and not think too many perverse thoughts or they'll come back and bite you. And not just in this lifetime, either, but in all your lifetimes going way back in your past and into your future. So maybe it's just my dad's karma to end up on a park bench feeding crows in this lifetime, and really you can't blame him for causing a human incident and wanting to move along to the next lifetime pretty quick. Anyway, Jiko says that as long as you keep trying to be a good person and making an effort to change, then finally one day all the good stuff you do will cancel out all the bad stuff that you've done, and you can become enlightened¹⁸ and hop on the elevator and never come back unless, as I said, you're like Jiko and you've taken a vow not to ride on the elevator unless everyone else gets on first. That's the great thing about my great granny. You can really count on her. She might be a hundred and four and say some pretty wacky things, but my old Jiko is totally dependable.

3. Conclusion

Despite the fact that in Nao's life, apparently there is always a thunder in the air to the point that she becomes reluctant to stay alive, convincing herself that her family doesn't stand a chance to happiness anymore, Ruth Ozeki takes readers by surprise, choosing a denouement that, forunately, proves pessimists wrong:

“ 生 . Sei¹⁹. *Ikiru*²⁰. To live. [...] To live now, to live for the present”

To live no matter what, to fight your way through life, and never give up might sound like old Jiko's last gift, last grain of sense, the treasure she wanted to entrust to her dear family, with her dying breath.

Ruth Ozeki is a novelist, filmmaker and Zen Buddhist priest, whose award-winning novels have been described as “witty, intelligent and passionate” by the Independent and as possessing “shrewd and playful humor, lush sexual sensuality and kinetic pizzazz” by the Chicago Tribune.

The daughter of a Japanese mother and a Canadian-American father, she was born and raised in New Haven, Connecticut. She attended Smith College and graduated with degrees in English Literature and Asian Studies. She received a Japanese Ministry of Education Fellowship to pursue graduate work in an assistant Japanese Literature and Area Women's University. During her years in Japan, she worked in Kyoto's entertainment "water district" as a bar hostess, studied Noh drama and mask carving, founded a language school, and taught on the faculty of Kyoto Sangyo University.

In 1985, Ozeki returned to New York City and started a film career as an art director, designing sets and props for low-budget horror movies, including little known classics such as Mutant Hunt, Breeders, Necropolis and Robot Holocaust. She then switched to television production, directing documentary series for Japanese TV.

In 1994, she started making her own films. Body of Correspondence (1994) won the New Visions Award at the San Francisco Film Festival and was broadcast on PBS. Halving the Bones (1995), an award-winning autobiographical film, was screened at the Sundance Film Festival, the Museum of Modern Art, the Montreal World Film Festival and the Margaret Mead Film Festival, among others. Ozeki's films are shown at universities, museums and arts venues internationally.

Her first novel, My Year of Meats, was published in 1998 by Viking Penguin and has garnered widespread glowing reviews, awards, and a still-growing readership. A sexy, poignant, funny tale about global meat and media production, My Year of Meats tells the story of Jane and Akiko, two women on opposite sides of the plane whose lives are connected by a TV cooking show. Selected as a New York Times Notable Book, My Year of Meats was an international success, translated into eleven languages and published in fourteen countries. It won the Kiriyama Pacific Rim Award, the Imus Barnes and Noble American Book Award, and a Special Jury Prize of the World Book Awards in Versailles.

According to Michael Pollan, author of The Omnivore's Dilemma, "Ruth Ozeki is benched making the novel in the corners of American culture no one else has thought to look-but where she finds us in all our trans-cultural and technological weirdness."

Ozeki's second novel, All Over Creation (Viking Penguin, 2003) shifts the focus from meat politics in a story of a family farmer, his prodigal daughter, an itinerant gang of environmental activists and a New Age corporate spin doctor, whose lives and interests collide in Liberty Falls, Idaho. In a starred review, Kirkus called his cast of characters "most fully realized and heart-wrenching in their imperfect yearnings," and declared All Over Creation, "a feast for mind and heart." Again a New York Times Notable Book, All Over Creation is the recipient of a 2004 American Book Award from the Before Columbus Foundation, as well as the Willa Literary Award for Contemporary Fiction.

Her most recent novel, A Tale for the Time Being, has been shortlisted for the Man Booker Prize and will be published in twenty-two countries. It tells the story of a mysterious diary, which washes up on a beach on the Pacific Northwest coast of Canada, in the wake of the 2011 Japanese earthquake and tsunami. The diary, written by a troubled schoolgirl in Tokyo, is discovered by a novelist named Ruth, who becomes obsessed with discovering the fate of the girl. The New York Times described it as an "intricate parable of a novel" which leads the reader "to contemplate the porous membrane that separates fact from fiction, self from circumstance, past from present." In a starred review, Kirkus called it "A masterpiece, pure and simple."

In 2006, Ozeki received an honorary doctorate from Smith College. She has been a contributor to the New York Times op-ed page, and her essays and short fiction have appeared in a number of anthologies. She frequently speaks at colleges and universities.

A longtime meditator, Ozeki was ordained as a Soto Zen priest in 2010 by her friend and teacher, Zokeku Norman Fisher, with whom she continues to study.

⁸ <<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zazen>> / <<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zazen>>

In Zen Buddhism, zazen (literally “seated meditation”) is a meditative discipline practitioners perform to calm the body and the mind, and be able to concentrate enough to experience insight into the nature of existence and, thereby, gain enlightenment.

Zazen is considered the heart of Zen Buddhist practice. The aim of zazen is just sitting, that is, suspending all judgmental thinking and letting words, ideas, images and thoughts pass by without getting involved in them.

In Zen temples and monasteries, practitioners traditionally sit zazen as a group in a meditation hall, usually referred to as the zendo.

The practitioner sits on a cushion called a zafu, which itself is usually placed on top of a low, flat mat called a zabuton.

Before making one's seat and after rising at the end of the period of zazen, a Zen practitioner performs a gassho bow to their seat, and a second bow to fellow practitioners.

<http://sbs.sanford.edu/szsb/translations/shobogenzo/translations/zazengi/zazengi_translation.html>

Studying Zen is zazen. For zazen, one should have a quiet place. Spread a thick sitting mat. Do not let in drafts or vapors; do not admit rain or dew. You should secure and maintain the spot where you place yourself. There are traces from the past of those who sat on a vajra [seat] or sat on a rock; they all spread a thick layer of grass on. The place where you sit should be bright; it should not be dark either day or night. The technique is to keep it warm in winter and cool in summer.

Do not let aside all involvements and distractions the myriad affairs. Good is not thought of; evil is not thought of. It is no mind, in detachment or consciousness; it is no thoughts, ideas or perceptions. Do not figure to make a Buddha; slough off sitting or reclining.

You should be moderate in food and drink. Hold dear the passing days and nights, and take to zazen as though brushing a fire from your head.

[...] Sitting fixedly, think of no thinking. How do you think of no thinking? Non-thinking. This is the art of zazen.

<<http://zmm.mro.org/ourthings/meditation-inspirations/>>

In zazen, we focus on the breath. Breathe in the void for me; it's the central activity of our bodies. Mind and breath are one reality: when your mind is agitated, your breath is agitated; when you're nervous, you breathe quickly and shallowly; when your mind is at rest, the breath is deep, easy, and effortless. It is important to center your attention in the hara. The hara is a place within the body, located two inches below the navel, inside the body. It's the physical and spiritual center of the body. In zazen, you will begin to develop a relationship with the hara. You will practice pulling your attention there; pulling your mind there. As you develop your zazen, you'll become more aware of the hara as the center of your awareness.

Practicing the breath

Begin rocking the body back and forth, slowly, in decreasing arcs, until you sense at your center of gravity. The mind is in the hara, hands are folded in the to smi mudra, mouth is closed, tongue pressed on the upper palate. You're breathing through the nose and you're completely experiencing the breath. Keep your attention on the hara and the breath.

We begin to steady and stabilize the mind by counting the breath. We practice by counting each inhalation and each exhalation, beginning with one and counting up to ten. Inhale - at the end of the inhalation, count one. Exhale - at the end of the exhalation, count

two. When you get to ten, to me back to one and start all over. The only agreement that you make with yourself in this process is that if your mind begins to wander- if you become aware that what you're doing is chasing thoughts- you will look at the thoughts, acknowledge it and then deliberately and consciously let it go and begin the count again alone.

The counting is a feedback to help you know when your mind has drifted off. Each time you return to the breath you are empowering yourself with the ability to put your mind where you want it and when you want it there, for as long as you want it there. That simple fact is extremely important. We call this power of concentration yoriki, or spiritual power.

When you've been practicing counting the breath for a while, your awareness will sharpen. You'll begin to notice things that were always there but escaped your attention. Because of the profound passion with the internal dialogue, you were too full to be able to see what was happening around you. The process of zazen begins to open that up.

When you're able to stay with the counting and repeatedly get to ten without any effort and without thoughts interfering, it's time to begin counting every cycle of the breath. Inhalation and exhalation will count as one, the next inhalation and exhalation as two. This provides less feedback, but with time, you will need less feedback.

Eventually, you'll want to just follow the breath and abandon the counting altogether. Just be with the breath! Just be the breath! Let the breath breathe itself! That's the beginning of the falling away of body and mind. It takes some time and you shouldn't rush it and you shouldn't move too fast from counting every breath to counting every other breath and on to following the breath. If you move ahead prematurely, you'll end up not developing strong yoriki. And it's that power of concentration that ultimately leads you to what we call samadhi, or single-pointedness of mind.

In the process of working with the breath, the thoughts that come up, for the most part, will be just noise, just random thoughts. Sometimes, however, when you're in a crisis or involved in something important in your life, you'll find that the thought, when you let it go, will recur. You let it go again but it comes back, you let it go and it still comes back. Sometimes that needs to happen. Don't treat that as a failure; treat it as another way of practicing. This is the time to let the thought happen, engage it, let it run its full course. But watch it, be aware of it. Allow it to do what it's going to do, let it exhaust itself. Then release it, let it go. Come back again to the breath. Start alone and to continue the process. Don't use zazen to suppress thoughts or issues that need to come up.

Staggered mental activity and energy keep us separated from each other, from our environment and from ourselves. In the process of sitting, the surface activity of our minds begins to slow down. The mind is like the surface of a pond- when the wind is blowing, the surface is disturbed and there are ripples. Nothing can be seen clearly because of the ripples; the reflected image of the sun or the moon is broken up into many fragments.

Out of that stillness, our whole life arises. If we don't begin with it, some time in our life, we will never get the opportunity to come to a point of rest. In deep zazen, deep samadhi, a person breathes a rate of only two or three breaths a minute. Normally, a person will breathe about fifteen breaths a minute- even when we're relaxing, we don't quite relax. The more completely your mind is at rest, the more deeply your body is at rest. Respiration, heart rate, circulation, and metabolism slow down in deep zazen. The whole body comes to a point of stillness that it doesn't reach even in deep sleep.

This is a very important and very natural aspect of being human. It is not something particularly unusual. All cultures on Earth have learned this and practice it. It's a very important part of being alive and staying alive: the ability to be completely awake.

It is also important to be patient and persistent, to consistently thinking of a goal, of how the sitting practice may help us. We just put ourselves in zazen and let go of our thoughts, opinions, positions - everything our minds hold on to. The human mind is basically free, not clinging. In zazen, we learn to untwist the mind, to see who we really are.

¹² <http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Suicide_in_Japan>

Suicide in Japan has become a significant national social issue. Japan has a relatively high suicide rate, but the number of suicides is declining and has been under 30,000 for 3 consecutive years. 71% of suicides in Japan were male, and it is the leading cause of death in men aged 20-44.

Factors in suicide include unemployment (due to the economic recession in the 1990s), depression, and social pressures. In 2007, the National Police Agency revised the categorization of motives for suicide into a division of 50 reasons with up to three reasons listed for each suicide. Suicides related to losing jobs surged 65.3 percent while those attributed to hardships in life increased 34.3 percent. Depression remained at the top of the list for the third year in a row, rising 7.1 percent from the previous year.

In Japanese culture, there is a long history of honorable suicide, such as ritual suicide by samurai. There has been a rapid increase in suicides since the 1990s. For example, 1998 saw a 34.7% increase over the previous year. This has prompted the Japanese government to react by increasing funding to research the causes of suicide and those recovering from failed suicides.

The most frequent location for suicides is in Aokigahara, a forested area at the base of Mount Fuji. In the period leading up to 1988, about 30 suicides occurred there every year. In 1999, 74 occurred, the record until 2002 when 78 suicides were found. That record was eclipsed the following year, when 105 bodies were found in 2003, and again in 2004 when 108 people killed themselves there. The area is patrolled by police looking for suicides, and altogether police records show that 247 people made suicide attempts in the forest in 2010- 54 of them successfully.

Railroad tracks are also a common place for suicide, and the Chūō Rapid Line is particularly known for a high number.

Historically, Japan has been a male-dominated (patriarchal) society with strong family ties and correlating social expectations; however, the bursting of the bubble which brought about the death of the "jobs-for-life" culture has left these heads of families unexpectedly struggling with job insecurity or the stigma of unemployment. Japan's economy, the world's third largest, experienced its worst recession since World War II in early 2009, propelling the nation's jobless rate to a record high of 5.7 percent in July 2009. The unemployed accounted for 57 percent of all suicides, the highest rate of any other occupation group. As a result of job losses, social inequality has also increased which has been shown in studies to have affected the suicide rates in Japan, proportionately more than in other countries.

A contributing factor to the suicide statistics among those who were employed was the increasing pressure of retaining jobs by putting in more hours of overtime and taking fewer holidays and sick days. According to government figures, “fatigue from work” and health problems, including work-related depression, were prime motives for suicides, adversely affecting the social wellbeing of salary men and attracting 47 percent of the suicides in 2008. Out of 2,207 work-related suicides in 2007, the most common reason (672 suicides) was overwork.

Japanese society's attitude toward suicide has been termed “tolerant”, and in many occasions, suicide is seen as a morally responsible action. Public discussion of the high rate of suicide also focuses on blaming the economic hardship faced by middle-aged men. During Japan's imperial years, suicide was common within the military. This included suicide when a battle was lost. The samurai way of glory was through death, and ritual suicide was seen as something honorable.

The cultural heritage of suicide as a noble tradition still has some resonance.

In 2007, the government released a nine-step plan, a “counter-suicide White Paper”, which it hopes will curb suicide by 20% by 2017. The goal of the White Paper is to encourage investigation of the root causes of suicide in order to prevent it and change cultural attitudes toward suicide, and improve the treatment of unsuccessful suicides. In 2009, the Japanese government committed 15.8 billion yen towards suicide prevention strategies.

Japan has allocated 12.4 billion yen ($133 million) in suicide prevention assets for the 2010 fiscal year ending March 2011, with plans to fund public counseling for those with overwhelming debts and those who need treatment for depression.

Amid the overall increase in self-inflicted death for 2009, the government aims there have been encouraging signs since September. The Cabinet Office said the number of monthly suicides declined year-on-year between September 2009 and April 2010. According to preliminary figures, compiled by the NPA, the number of suicides fell 9.0 percent from the year before.

The students spend numerous hours together in a work-oriented environment. Thus, Japanese society became extremely concerned about school bullying in the 1980s not because Japanese schools were especially violent in nature, but precisely because the more extreme bullying incidents took place in an otherwise achievement-driven, highly structured, conformist, demanding, and often stressful environment.

As a matter of fact, bullying began to increase at an alarming rate even as school violence in general decreased in the early 1980s. From 1982 to 1986, acts of school violence decreased from 4,315 to 2,801 incidents, although they have increased considerably in recent years (The Japan Times Online, 2001; The Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science, and Technology, 1999, 2000). Bullying in schools was recognized by scholars and others as a distinct category of problematic behaviors, which needed to be distinguished from other types of school violence.

The corresponding Japanese word for bullying is Ijime. It is a term rather frequently used in everyday speech both for certain school situations and for other forms of “mobbing” in work situations or elsewhere. According to Kojien, one of the reliable Japanese dictionaries, the Japanese word, Ijimeru (verb of Ijime) is described as “to treat a weak person(s) harshly.” Other dictionaries use translations such as: “to be cruel to, to tease, to annoy, to bully.”

The prototype of Ijime involves bullying in order to gain some sort of advantage over others, who are handicapped and stigmatized in terms of their physical characteristics, social class background, meek personality, and so on.

It should be added that the term Ijime tends to have a feminine ring to many Japanese ears, pointing as it does to the more indirect styles of aggression. These include strategies designed to isolate a person socially, teasing the person in a destructive way, spreading rumors and slandering victims, whispering behind a person's back, introducing subtle innuendoes, ganging up on a person, and in general, the no less generic arts of social manipulation and intimidation. In the American psychology literature, such strategies are often referred to as relational rather than physical aggression.

Ijime is a conspicuous and widely discussed phenomenon, although Japanese schools are not generally violent places. At the same time, discussions of Ijime strike a special nerve among many Japanese commentators, because they readily recognize it as a difficult to avoid and "dark" collective victimization phenomenon, frequently shrouded in secrecy. It represents the unattractive underside of a group-oriented, pressured, conformity demanding, highly regulated, but also rapidly changing society.

Many victims remain quiet about their difficult lives and neither parents nor teachers or school principals are likely to understand the full extent of bullying at the schools. The victims may believe that bullying is their own responsibility and they should endure it, they should not "bother" others with their problems; their teachers are unable or unwilling to help them, and siding with authority figures about the bullying situation may only lead to further bullying incidents rather than their disappearance. In other words, some victims may fear acts of revenge by their classmates and so-called friends.

A highly dramatic and widely publicized case of school bullying occurred in 1986 in a junior high school, located in Tokyo: a 13-year-old student changed himself and left a despairing suicide note, attacking several boys of having created a living hell for him. In one instance, when he came to school, he found that the Ijime group leaders had placed his desk in front of the class and arranged a mock funeral including burning incense, his photograph, flowers, and a condolence card that had been signed by most of his classmates and some other boys together with his homeroom teacher and three other teachers. Through this arrangement he was made to understand that in the eyes of his classmates and some of his teachers, he was somehow a failure as a human being.

Better known in China as "Master Meng" (Chinese: Mengzi), Mencius was a fourth-century BCE Chinese thinker whose importance in the Confucian tradition is second only to that of Confucius himself. In many ways, he played the role of St. Paul to Confucius' Jesus, interpreting the thought of the master for subsequent ages while simultaneously impressing Confucius' ideas with his own philosophical stamp. He is most famous for his theory of human nature, according to which all human beings share an innate goodness that either can be cultivated through education and self-discipline or squandered through neglect and negative influences, but never lost altogether.

Mencius remains a perennially attractive figure for those intrigued by moral psychology, of which he was the foremost practitioner in early China.

Mencius inherits from Confucius a set of terms and a series of problems. In general, one can say that where Confucius saw a unity of inner and outer in terms of li (ritual propriety), ren (to-humanity), and the junzi (profound person) - xiaoren (small person) distinction – Mencius tends to privilege the inner aspects of character, practices, and identity. For Mencius, the locus of philosophical activity and self-cultivation is the xin (shin), a term that denotes both the chief organ of the circulatory system and the organ of thought and hence is translated here and in many other sources as “heart-mind.” Mencius’ views of the divine, political organization, human nature, and the path toward personal development all start and end in the heart-mind.

A heart-mind that sympathizes is the sprout of co-humanity [ren]; a heart-mind that is aware of shame is the sprout of righteousness [yi]; a heart-mind that defers to others is the sprout of ritual propriety [li]; a heart-mind that approves and condemns is the sprout of wisdom [zhi]... If anyone having the four sprouts within himself knows how to develop them to the full, it is like fire that is kindled, or a spring as it first bursts through. If able to develop them, he is able to promote them in the entire world; if unable, he is unable to serve even his parents.

The primary function of Mencius’ moral psychology is to explain how moral failure is possible and how it can be avoided. As Antonio S. Yu has noted, for Mencius, moral failure is the failure to develop one’s xin (heart-mind). In order to attain virtue for the moral mechanics of the xin, Mencius offers a quasi-physiological theory involving qi (vital energy) – “a hard thing to speak about”, par vapor, par fluid, found in the atmosphere and in the human body that regulates affective-to-gnave processes as well as one’s general well-being. It is especially abundant outdoors at night and in the early morning, which is why taking fresh air at these times can act as a physical and spiritual tonic. When Mencius is asked about his personal strengths, he says: I know how to speak, and I am good at nourishing my flood-like qi.

RESUME

La langue roumaine actuelle, fid le miroir de la soci t , est pleine de m taphores qui forgent son identit  culturelle. On va s'occuper dans cet article d'une m taphore pr sente non seulement en roumain, mais qui prend tout son sens dans notre langue. Il s'agit du c ur bris  „inimă frântă” qui, du langage commun, pass  dans le langage m dical en traduisant la cardiomyopathie de stress ou le syndrome de Tako-tsubo. On peut dire, avec Nichita Stănescu „C ur, c ur, plan te myst rieuse / o  j'aurais aim  vivre et mourir.”

Mots-cl s: c ur bris , m taphore, cardiomyopathie de stress, syndrome Tako-tsubo, langage commun/langage m dical

Poeții c ntă de c nd lumea inimile fr nte. Ei bine, s-ar p rea c  această metaforă este preluat  de cardiologi pentru a explica faptul c  amăr ciunea și stresul de proporții ar fi cu adev rat capabile s  fr ngă la propriu inima.

1. Metaforele inimii

Dac  primul sens al cuv ntului inimă este unul medical, de „organul intern musculos central al aparatului circulator, situat  n partea st ngă a toracelui, care are rolul de a asigura, prin contractiile sale ritmice, circulația s ngelui  n organism, la om și la animalele superioare; cord” (DEX 2009), acesta trece  n limbajul comun  ntr-o serie de locuțiuni și expresii, una mai gr itoare dec t alta. Limba română actuală este o fidelă oglindă a societății,  n continuă c utare de sine  n ceea ce privește identitatea lexicală. Problema inimii este pasionantă, tulburătoare și neelucidată de cunoașterea umană. Inima este „sinteza și centrul ființei umane, a funcțiilor și facultăților spirituale omenești” (O dragoste mincinoasă. Păcatul desfr nării). Taina omului este,  n ultimă analiză, taina inimii sale și a bogatului ei univers, c ci inima, fiind de natură spirituală, se află la hotarul dintre Dumnezeu și noi, fiind simțirea, voința, mintea omului, toate la un loc. (de Beaugard, 1995: 179)

Dac  examinăm metaforele inimii, imaginea pe care acestea ne-o dau nu este aceea a unui model conceptual unic, ci a mai multor submodele ce țin de semnificația existenței inimii pentru individ, de centralitatea simbolică a inimii care

o plasează în centrul organismului, chiar dacă ea se află în stânga, de funcțiile inimii ce o plasează în relație cu sufletul și mintea, de capacitatea individului de a o manevra, de capacitatea sa de a acționa de sine stătător prin disocierea de eu și de structura sa.

Pentru individ, inima este un organ vital, existența sa depinzând de bătăile inimii, fapt ce conduce la conceperea existenței omului ca o inimă în metafore precum inimi pioase, inimi fierbinți, inimă care bate (pentru cineva), dar oameni de inimă, oameni cu inimă sau indivizi fără inimă. A avea inimă bună înseamnă a fi generos, în timp ce putem muri de inimă rea.

Ca centru simbolic, inima este plasată într-o serie de metafore care nici măcar nu mai sunt percepute ca atare: inima orașului, inima conferinței, inima pădurii, inima copacului, inima pământului etc. pentru a desemna partea de mijloc, interiorul, partea centrală, centrul.

Legat de afecte, funcțiile inimii sunt subsumate aceleia de receptacul al emoțiilor și sentimentelor, uneori chiar de cauză a acestora. „Ca funcție integratoare și sintetizatoare a individualității și personalității umane inima este «izvorul vieții și centrul sufletului»”(Nellias, 1994: 133): „centru metafizic, loc al întâlnirii divinului cu umanul, al harului cu natura, inima este locul către care converg și unde se integrează toate facultățile umane: rațiune, sentiment și voință” (Teșu, 2004: 124) Marea majoritate a metaforelor legate de inimă țin de această ipotetică funcție: foc la inimioară, cade cu tronc la inimă, îl trage inima, te unge la inimă, îți merge drept la inimă. Dacă cele mai multe metafore se referă la inimă ca sediu al unor sentimente pozitive: inimă bună, inimă deschisă, inimă largă, inimă curată, inimă dreaptă, inimă de aur, bun la inimă, băiat de inimă etc., inima apare și ca sediu al unor sentimente negative: a fi rău (câinos, negru) la inimă, a avea inimă haină (sălbatică), a fi fără inimă, a avea inimă de piatră (împietrită). Inima este legată de psihic în locuțiuni precum: îi merge la inimă, pune (la) inimă, iși ia inima în dinți, foc la inimioară; este legată de curaj, de îndrăzneala sau de energia, de puterea de voință sau de acțiune a cuiva: înfruntă pericolul cu inimă rece; a(-și) pierde inima = a-și pierde curajul, speranța, a se descuraja; a(-și) lua inima în dinți = a-și face curaj, a se hotărî să întreprindă ceva; a-i veni (cuiva) inima la loc, se spune când cineva își recapătă calmul, echilibrul și curajul după un moment de emoție sau de spaimă; a (mai) prinde (la) inimă = a căpăta (din nou) putere, curaj, a se restabili sufletește, a nu-i mai fi teamă; a-i ține cuiva inima = a încuraja, a consola pe cineva; a i se face (cuiva) inima cât un purice = a-i fi (cuiva) frică de ceva; a se descuraja; a i se tăia inima = a-și pierde curajul.

Dacă funcțiile inimii nu depind de voință, ea poate, în schimb, să fie dăruită, răpită, scoasă și pusă altundeva, poate fi luată în stăpânire. Genul liric abundă de astfel de asocieri.

Inima poate să-și facă de cap, să zboare, să lupte, poate suferi diverse transformări (crește, râde, îngheață, doare, plânge, suspină, geme, oftează, arde, seacă, se frânge, se topește, se îmbolnăvește): i s-a bucurat inima, după voia (pofa) inimii, a râde inima în cineva, a-i râde cuiva inima, a-și călca pe inimă, i s- a frânt inima (inima moare fără ca individul să prindă de veste, în general, din cauza amorului).

Inima poate fi grea sau ușoară, verde sau albastră, poate suporta o povară: a avea ceva la (pe) inimă, a-i sta ceva pe inimă, a fi negru la inimă, inimă albastră (utilizat în cântece de dragoste numite și cântece de inimă albastră pentru a arăta supărarea, întristarea, însingurarea). Inima străpunsă de săgeată este metafora vizuală pentru înfățișarea amorului.

Materia din care este făcută inima nu este indiferentă. Astfel avem inimă de piatră, inimă de zahăr, inimă de aur. Și temperatura trădează anumite stări ale inimii: o inimă caldă este una ce trădează bunătatea, generozitatea, o inimă care arde, care este înflăcărată poate fi ori din cauza unei idei, ori din cauza mâniei, ori a iubirii. La polul opus, dacă este rece sau chiar îngheață, nu este capabilă de sentimente tandre sau de sentimente înalte.

2. Sindromul Tako-tsubo

Metaforele având ca bază „inima” se constituie într-o serie de modele explicative pentru fizicul și psihicul uman. Senzația de apăsare (are ceva pe inimă) are și ea o sursă fiziologică: un medic cardiolog ar putea să ne spună multe despre aceste exprimări inerent metaforice. Element al corpului, dar în același timp «ascunsă», percepută prin «semnale» care trebuie să fie interpretate, inima constituie, probabil, organul cel mai în măsură să întruchipeze dualitățile corp-suflet, rațiune-sentiment, dar și să sugereze misterul.

Pornind de la metafora „inimii frânte”, ne întrebăm dacă putem oare cu adevărat să avem inima frântă la propriu? Această expresie, utilizată cel mai adesea după o ruptură amoroasă, nu este doar o simplă imagine: există chiar un sindrom care-i poartă numele. Medicina de azi demonstrează ceea ce poezii, scriitorii, artiștii, muzicienii au afirmat de secole, că inima se poate îmbolnăvi, în mod fizic, real, în urma unor suferințe sufletești foarte mari.

Inima frântă este o descoperire japoneză. Într-adevăr japonezii au fost primii care și-au dat seama, în 1991, că o inimă frântă la figurat, are urmări în plan fizic. În sindromul inimii frânte o parte din inimă se mărește, afecțiune care poartă numele de cardiomiopatie Tako-tsubo (după denumirea unui vas folosit de pescarii japonezi la prinderea caracatițelor) sau cardiomiopatie de stres. Pe radiografii, inima mărită a bolnavilor seamănă cu acest vas.

Sindromul „inimii frânte” se declanșează după un stres emoțional sau fizic. Numită și cardiomiopatie de stres, este o entitate clinică recent descrisă ce definește o afectare cardiacă acută ce evoluează ca o cardiopatie ischemică ce asociază sindromul coronarian și insuficiența cardiacă la diverse grade, fără leziune organică coronariană și, în general, cu rezoluție spontană. Se caracterizează prin absența stenozei coronare semnificative angiografic și un aspect caracteristic de balonizare apicală a ventriculului stâng în timpul sistolic al ventriculografiei (Sato, Tateishi, Uchida, 1990: 56-64).

Criteriile de definire stabilite de Mayo clinic (Bybee, Kara, Prasad 2004; 141(11): 858-65; Kawai, Kitabatake, Tomoike 2007; 71(6): 990-2) în 2004, apoi în 2007, sunt: hipokinezie, akinezie sau diskinezie tranzitorie apicală a ventriculului stâng cu sau fără atingere mediană; anomalii printre care atingerea regională ce se întinde dincolo de o distribuție vasculară epicardică; un declanșator de stres (frecvent, dar nu întotdeauna prezent); lipsa bolii coronariene obstructive sau a semnelor angiografice de ruptură acută a plăcii de aterom; anomalii electrocardiografice recente (denivelarea segmentului ST și/sau inversarea undei T) sau creștere modestă a troponinei cardiace; absența miocarditei, a feicromocitomului.

Urmare a unui stres emoțional (uneori, stres fizic intens), mai ales la femeile postmenopauză, descărcarea catecolaminelor endogene tip adrenalină antrenează o reacție intensă cu siderare miocardică. La coronarografie alterarea microcirculației coronariene nu este obiectivabilă. Fenomenul ar putea fi explicat prin concentrarea diferită a receptorilor beta-adrenergici la nivelul apexului cardiac. Dacă recuperarea este regula, s-a înregistrat un procent de mortalitate de 3,7% în acest sindrom (Bybee, Prasad, 2008; 118(4): 397-409; Afonso, Bachour, Awad, Sandidge, 2008; 9(6): 849-54; Ito, Sugihara, Katoh, Azuma, Nakagawa, 2003; 17(2): 115-22).

Se prezintă ca o insuficiență cardiacă acută cu dispnee brutală, asociată eventual unei simptomatologii dureroase anginoase. Pacienții nu au decât foarte puține antecedente sau factori de risc cardiovascular. Diagnosticul diferențial cuprinde și alte cauze de dispnee/angor de origine cardiacă sau respiratorie cum ar fi: sindromul coronarian acut, edemul pulmonar cardiogen, șocul cardiogen de altă origine, miocardita acută, embolia pulmonară, criza de astm și bronhospasmul, decompensarea respiratorie a BPCO, edemul pulmonar lezional, SDRA, pneumopatii (Peschanski, 2011: 865-877). Sunt posibile complicații de șoc cardiogen, obstrucție a fluxului sanguin la ieșirea din ventriculul stâng, accident vascular cerebral și formare de tromboză apicală. Responsabilă de moarte subită, a fost descrisă ruptura ventriculului stâng. Complicațiile acute survin la 20 % dintre pacienți. Decesul ca urmare a unui Takotsubo este rar 1-3,2 %, dar în caz de supraviețuire se constată o recuperare ad integrum a funcției miocardice în 94-100 % din cazuri (Gianni, Dentali, Grandi, Sumner, Hiralal, Lonn, 2006; 27(13): 1523-9; Donohue, Movahed, 2005; 10(4): 311-6).

Simptomul cel mai frecvent este reprezentat printr-o durere toracică adesea tipică, frecvent asociată unei dispnei. Antecedentele personale ale pacientului nu există sau sunt sărace în plan cardiovascular (Donohue, Movahed, 2005; 10(4): 311-6; Pilgrim, Wyss, 2008; 124(3): 283-92.) Factorii de stres intens (emoțional sau fizic) survin în 65 % din cazuri (Donohue, Movahed, 2005; 10(4): 311-6; Sato, Fujita, Saito, 2006; 70(8): 947-53).

Examenul fizic nu este specific, fiind adesea normal, în afara simptomatologiei dureroase. La auscultarea pulmonară, în caz de dispnee asociată, pacientul evocă o insuficiență cardiacă congestivă: murmur ventricular diminuat la cele două baze pulmonare și raluri crepitante declive; ortopneea este clasică în acest context de edem pulmonar acut. Auscultarea cardiacă relevă cel mai adesea o tahicardie regulată moderată, dat sunt descrise și cazuri de bradicardie sau de tahiaritmii. Pacienții pot fi anxioși, pe fond de stres emoțional sau fizic persistent (Bybee, Prasad, 2008; 118(4): 397-409; Buchholz, Rudan, 2007; 83(978): 261-4; Gianni, Dentali, Grandi, Sumner, Hiralal, Lonn, 2006; 27(13): 1523-9.)

Examen neinvaziv prin excelență, reproductibil și evolutiv, poate reprezenta elementul cheie de orientare a diagnosticului. Anomaliile ECG sunt aproape constant prezente în faza acută (Bybee, Prasad, 2008; 118(4): 397-409; Gianni, Dentali, Grandi, Sumner, Hiralal, Lonn, 2006; 27(13): 1523-9; Toshiaki, Kiyoshi, Satoshi, 2010; 55(22): 2514-17; Prasad, Lerman, Rihal, 2008; 155(3): 408-17.). Nu există deci nici un semn ECG patognomonic sau a cărui specificitate să fie destul de importantă pentru a diferenția sindromul Takotsubo de un infarct miocardic cu denivelare a segmentului ST (Bybee, Prasad, 2008; 118(4): 397-409; Gianni, Dentali, Grandi, Sumner, Hiralal, Lonn, 2006; 27(13): 1523-9; Toshiaki, Kiyoshi, Satoshi, 2010; 55(22): 2514-17; Prasad, Lerman, Rihal, 2008; 155(3): 408-17).

Markerii cardiaci, în special troponina, sunt crescuți, în 90-93 % din cazuri, dar în proporții mai mici decât cele observate în sindrom coronarian acut cu denivelare de segment ST (Kawai, Kitabatake, Tomoike, 2007; 71(6): 990-2; Bybee, Prasad, 2008; 118(4): 397-409; Sharkey, Lesser, Menon, Parpart, Maron, Maro, 2008; 101(12): 1723-8). Coronarografia arată lipsa leziunii coronare angiografice, permițând eliminarea unui SCA pur. Studiul cineticii ventriculului stâng sau ventriculografia arată o disfuncție ventriculară severă cu absența contracției apexului cardiac, în timp ce baza se contractă normal (Kolkebeck, Cotant, Krasuski, 2007; 25(1): 92-5; Park, Prasad, Rihal, 2009; 84(6): 514-521; Riera, Llompart-Pou, Carrillo, 2010; 68: E13-E15; Scheffel, Stolzmann, Karlo, 2008; 31(1): 226-7).

Nu există consens în privința îngrijirii acestei maladii: se face, minimum, oxigenoterapie, ventilație neinvazivă, asistență respiratorie (Bybee, Prasad, 2008; 118(4): 397-409).

Această boală afectează în special persoanele care-și pierd ființele dragi, fiind o maladie misterioasă ce imită simptomele unui infarct, care însă nu au legătură cu cauzele reale ale infarctului. Sindromul „inimii frânte” este provocat de o emoție puternică în urma căreia organismul eliberează o cantitate foarte mare de adrenalină (hormon de stres), care afectează inima. „Injecția” cu adrenalină în exces conduce la blocarea ventriculului drept, întrerupe ciclul de de contracții și împiedică transportul sângelui în organism. Acesta este un adevărat șoc pentru inimă, dar și pentru întregul organism, se aseamănă cu un infarct, însă nu este provocat de un blocaj al arterelor, ci de stres.

Deși creierul este considerat de anatomici și fiziologi „regele organelor”, se pare că inima îl poate detrona oricând, iar istoria, religia sau literatura vin cu argumente/metafore puternice în sprijinul acestei idei.

Inima frântă nu este un mit, ci un sindrom uneori mortal, așa cum au demonstrat oamenii de știință. Este deci posibil, așa cum Charles Aznavour cântă de circa 50 de ani, să mori din dragoste, "Mourir d'aimer", refren popular pe care numeroși medici îl analizează cu atenție.

RESUME:

La mort subite demeure un problème majeur de santé publique dans les pays industrialisés, se trouvant à l'origine de plus de 60 % des décès chez les adultes atteints de coronaropathie. La survie des patients en AC est intimement liée à la précocité et à la qualité de leur prise en charge initiale. Nous allons voir par la suite l'évolution de la définition de la mort cardiaque subite, les étiologies et sa physiopathologie.

Mots-clés: mort subite, décès, maladie, étiologie, physiopathologie

Moartea subită este definită ca deces imprevizibil ce survine într-o oră de la debutul simptomelor acute. Corespunde survenirii unei morți brutale, neașteptate și naturale, la subiectul în plină activitate și în bună stare de sănătate aparentă. Elementele cheie ale definiției sunt: caracterul natural (netraumatic), rapid (maxim 1 oră) și neașteptat (subit) al evenimentului final. (Carmen Ginghină, 2010: 725-735) Ea este cel mai adesea legată de o disfuncție bruscă a activității electrice a inimii cu sau fără patologie subiacentă, având drept consecință un stop respirator. Are origine cardiacă în 85 % din cazuri. (Bayes de Luna et al. 1989; 117: 151-9)

Moartea subită este principala cauză de deces, afectând anual aproximativ 460.000 de indivizi în SUA (SAUS et al., 1997; 18: 1231-48; Zipes, Wellens, 1998; 98: 2334-2351) și aproximativ 700.000 de indivizi în Europa (American Heart Association, 2005). La subiectul tânăr sportiv moartea subită nu este rară, în Statele Unite murind un atlet la patru zile. (Maron, Doerer, Haas, Tierney, Mueller, 2006; 114: 830) Frecvența morților subite cardiace crește odată cu vârsta, fiind mai mică la femei. (Deo, Albert, 2012; 125: 620-637)

Moartea naturală se definește prin opoziție cu moartea violentă care este provocată de un agent extern (fizic sau toxic). (Franchitto, 2012) Moartea subită este o moarte naturală a cărei expresie bruscă poate fi considerată suspectă de către magistrați și cere intervenția medicilor legiști. Această moarte subită este adesea inexplicabilă. Moartea subită de origine cardiacă este o moarte naturală care survine inopinat la un subiect în bunăstare de sănătate aparentă fie la o oră după apariția simptomelor eventuale, fie după manifestările de agonie scurtă.

Această definiție a morții naturale nu reflectă realitatea clinică în sensul în care majoritatea deceselor prin moarte naturală survin la domiciliul pacientului și sunt constatate după descoperirea cadavrului la câteva ore de la deces. În consecință, moartea cardiacă poate fi considerată subită dacă cel decedat părea în stare bună de sănătate cu 24 de ore înainte de deces.

Etiologie și clasificare

La prima analiză a ritmului ventricular, aproximativ 40% dintre pacienții aflați în stop cardio-respirator prezintă fibrilație ventriculară (FV) (Cobb, Fahrenbruch, Olsufka, Copass, 2002; 288:3008-1; Rea, Eisenberg, Sinibaldi, White 2004; 63:17-24; Vaillancourt, Stiell, 2004; 20:1081-90; Waalewijn, de Vos, Koster, 1998; 38:157-67) sau tahicardie ventriculară, chiar dacă în momentul evaluării ECG ei prezintă asistolie.

Atingerea coronariană reprezintă aproximativ 80 % din cazurile de moarte subită de origine ritmică, fie prin FV în cursul unei ischemii acute, fie în evoluția cardiomiopatiei consecutive unei atingeri coronariene cronice cu sau fără sechele de infarct. (Huikuri, Castellanos, Myerburg 2001;345:1473—82. Cea mai importantă cauză de moarte subită este boala coronariană acută (75-80% din cazuri). (Ginghină, 2010; 725-735) În contextul bolii cardiace ischemice, ruptura unei plăci de ateranom cu ocluzie coronariană și ischemie miocardică acută poate conduce la tahicardie ventriculară de regulă polimorfă și la moarte subită. 15% din morțile subite survin pe o cardiomiopatie dilatată neischemică sau pe o cardiopatie hipertrofică, precum și pe displazia aritmogenă de VD. Alte cauze, cuprinse între 5-10% sunt reprezentate de anomalii electrice cardiace pe cord structural normal - sindromul de QT lung, sindromul Brugada, tahicardia ventriculară polimorfă catecolamonergică; de bolile congenitale - anomalii ale coroanelor, boli congenitale cianogene/necianogene; de anomalii mecanice cardiace - stenoză aorticpm prolaps de valvă mitrală.(Krahn, Healey, Chauhan, Birnie, Simpson, Champagne et al 2009;120:278—85)

Survenirea unei morți subite este în principal secundară unei cardiopatii coronariene responsabile de tulburările ritmului ventricular, boala coronariană fiind responsabilă de aproximativ $\frac{3}{4}$ din morțile subite.(Deo, Albert, 2012; 125: 620-637) Embolia pulmonară și accidentele vasculare cerebrale sunt și ele etiologii frecvent întâlnite. În ciuda investigațiilor realizate, în absența atingerii cardiace evidente, mai puțin din jumătate din morțile subite recuperate la adult nu primesc o explicație satisfăcătoare. (Krahn, Healey, Chauhan et al, 2009;120:278-285)

La subiectul tânăr, survenirea unei morți brutale în timpul unui efort ne face să ne gândim la următoarele patologii cardiovasculare: cardiomiopatii (cardiomiopatie hipertrofică, displazie aritmogenă a ventriculului drept, cardiomiopatie dilatată), patologii coronariene (anomalie congenitală la originea și/sau pe traiectul arterelor coronariene, cel mai adesea), valvulopatii (îngustare aortică și prolapsus al valvei mitrale în principal), miocardite, canalopatii (sindromul QT lung, sindromul QT scurt, sindromul Brugada), tulburări de conducere, blocuri de ramură, blocuri atrio-ventriculare, sindroame de preexcitații ventriculare din care cel mai frecvent este

Commotio cordis, expresia latină ce semnifică « șoc pe inimă », este un caz aparte, ce constă într-o moarte subită în clipele imediat următoare ale unui șoc toracic ce provoacă o fibrilație ventriculară în absența unei anomalii structurale a inimii înainte de traumatism. Impactul traumatic în regiunea parasternală poate induce un bloc atrioventricular complet sau o tahicardie.(François 2014; 43: 831–839)

În cadrul populației generale, etiologia morții subite poartă asupra analizei factorilor de risc tradiționalide ateroscleroză coronariană, și găsim o asociere între acești factori și moartea subită, confirmând astfel indirect pe plan epidemiologic datele anatomopatologice.(Kannel, Doyle, McNamara, Quicketon, Gordon 1975; 51: 606-13; Schatzkin, Cupples, Heeren, Morelock, Kannel 1984; 120: 888-99; Suhonen, Reunanen, Knekt, Aromaa 1988; 223: 19-25; Hinkle, Thaler, Merke, Reiner-Berg, Morton 1988; 127: 500-15) Lucrările recente urmăresc punerea în evidență a factorilor de risc mai specifici legați direct de susceptibilitatea dezvoltării tulburărilor de ritm ventricular. Etiologia morții cardiace subite este studiată pe patru plabnuri: etiologia genetică, metabolică, adrenergică și psihosocială.

O contribuție familială (genetică și/sau de mediu) la riscul de moarte subită a fost sugerată de două studii princeps (Friedlander, Siscovick, Weinmann et al., 1998; 97: 155- 60; Jouven, Desnos, Guerot, Ducimetiere 1999; 99: 1978-83) în care antecedentele părintești de moarte subită (dar nu și de infarct miocardic) erau legate de riscul de moarte subită – mai mare dacă antecedentele erau prezente la ambi(Jouven, Desnos, Guerot, Ducimetiere 1999; 99: 1978-83.) O abordare genă-candidat a pus în evidență rolul polimorfismelor canalelor ionice (implicate clasic în sindroamele monogenice cu înalt risc de moartes subită) în survenirea fenotipului morții subite în cadrul populației generale (Albert Nam, Rimm et al., 2008; 117: 16-23).

Etiologia metabolică

Alcoolul prezintă o relație destul de complexă cu moartea subită, un consum mare de alcool > 6 pahare pe zi mărește riscul tardiv de moarte subită.(Albert, Manson, Cook, Ajani, Gaziano, Hennekens, 1999; 100: 944-50) Diabetul de tip II a fost evocat ca gradient de risc specific de moarte subită în funcție de stadiul diabetului (Curb, Rodriguez, Burchfiel et al., 1995; 9: 2591-5; Balkau, Jouven, Ducimetiere, Eschwege, 1999; 354: 1968-9) și de severitatea acestuia, precum și în funcție de nivelul glicemiei, care pot conduce la complicații microvasculare (Jouven, Lemaître, Rea, Sotoodehnia, Empana, Siscovick 2005; 26: 2142-7).

Fiziopatologiile ce privesc acest tip de diabet fac apel în special la neuropatia autonomă diabetică și la arteroscleroza macrvasculară (coronaă) accelerată. O creștere a fluxului acizilor grași liber (AGL) circulanți este specific asociată riscului de moarte subită (Jouven, Charles, Desnos, Ducimetiere, 2001; 104: 756-61), din cauza proprietăților pro-aritmogene pe termen scurt ale acestora, iar pe termen lung datorită favorizării dezvoltării unei insulinorezistențe, apoi a unui diabet de tip 2.(Willebrands, Ter Welle, Tasseron ,1973; 5: 259-73; Charles, Eschwege, Thibult et al., 1997; 40: 1101-6) Obezitatea absominală este și ea descrisă în asociere cu moartea subită, existînd un gradient de risc specific între aceasta din urmă și nivelul diametrului sagital abdominal (indicele antropometric al adipozității abdominale) (Empana, Ducimetiere, Charles, Jouven, 2004; 110: 2781-5), mai ales la subiecții cu indice al masei corporale normale care în mod clasic erau considerați cu risc scăzut. Aceste rezultate sunt susținute în plan fiziopatologic de faptul că adipozitatea absominală este însoțită de creșterea fluxului de acizi grași liberi circulanți ce favorizează în plan secund dezvoltarea diabetului de tip II. În cadrul sindromului metabolic coexistă frecvent diabetul, AGL-ul și obezitatea abdominală. Așa cum era de așteptat, s-a sugerat o legătură între sindromul metabolic și moartea subită (Empana, Ducimetiere, Balkau, Jouven, 2007; 28: 1149-54), din cauza ponderii importante a factorilor legați de dezvoltarea arterosclerozei ce definesc sindromul metabolic. Acizii grași polinesaturați au o contribuție importantă în reducerea riscului de moarte subită. Prin consumul frecvent de pește, nuci și prin dozarea serică sau intramembranară de acizi grași omega se reduce riscul de moarte subită.(Albert, Hennekens, O'Donnell et al., 1998; 279: 23-8; Albert, Gaziano, Willett Manson, 2002; 162: 1382-7; Albert, Campos, Stampfer et al., 2002; 346: 1113-8; Siscovick, Raghunathan, King et al., 1995; 274: 1363-7)

Etiologia adrenergică

Activitatea fizică, în funcție de intensitatea și de caracterul obișnuit sau nu al acesteia, se pare că se află în raport de dependență cu moartea subită. Riscul de moarte subită este diminuat dacă activitatea fizică este regulată și moderată (Lemaitre, Siscovick, Raghunathan, Weinmann, Arbogast, Lin, 1999; 159: 686-90) (echilibrează balanța autonomică), fiind mprit în caz de activitate fizică intensă și neregulată (Albert, Mittleman, Chae, Lee, Hennekens, Manson, 2000; 343: 1355-61) (poate contribui la ruperea unei plăci de aterom ce precipită evenimentele ischemice, apoi ritmice). Frecvența cardiacă în repaus este un marker simplu al echilibrului simpatic/parasimpatic, indicând o asociere specifică între nivelul frecvenței cardiace în repaus și riscul de moarte subită.(Jouven, Zureik, Desnos, Guerot, Ducimetiere, 2001; 50: 373-8) Frecvența cardiacă la efort constituie și ea un marker de risc specific de moarte subită, și nu de deces prin infarct miocardic.(Jouven, Empana, Schwartz, Desnos, Courbon, Ducimetiere, 2005; 352: 1951-8) Subiecții la care, în cursul unei probe de efort sub-maximale, creșterea frecvenței cardiace în timpul efortului este insuficientă, prezintă un risc multiplicat cu 4 de moarte subită în raport cu subiecții la care creșterea este adaptată. Sunt cu risc specific de moarte subită și subiecții la care diminuarea frecvenței cardiace la un minut după încetarea efortului.

Etiologia psihosocială

Asocierea factorilor psihosociali cu moartea subită a fost puțin studiată, cu toate că depresia sau suportul social au fost descrise ca factori în cadrul bolilor cardiovasculare. Lucrări recente au descris o legătură între anxietatea fobică și moartea subită la bărbați și, mai recent, și la femei (Albert, Chae, Rexrode, Manson, Kawachi, 2005; 111: 480-7), descriindu-se, de asemenea, asocieri între serevritatea depresiei și stopul cardiac (Empana, Jouven, Lemaitre et al., 2006; 166: 195-200) (independent de tratamentul antidepressiv).

Fiziopatologie

Trebuie să se identifice corect anumite cauze de moarte subită cardiacă, deoarece ele au fie elemente specifice de îngrijire, fie prezintă patologii ereditare ce trebuie căutate la membrii familiei pacientului.

Pot fi ereditare anumite cardiomiopatii responsabile de moarte subită. Îngrijirea cardiomiopatiilor dilatate sau hipertrofice ereditare se realizează prin implantarea unui DAI după o moarte subită resuscitată. Displazia ventriculară dreaptă aritmogenă (DVDA) este o patologie ereditară, greu de diagnosticat în faza inițială (efortul este contraindicat în această patologie deoarece conduce la aritmii ventriculare), betablocantele având efect protector. (Fontaine, Guiraudon, Frank, Tereau, Fillette, Marcus et al., 1982;75:361-71; Hershberger, Cowan, Morales, Siegfried, 2001; 345: 1473-8; 2009; 2:253—61) Sunt tot ereditare bolile ritmice ereditare, descendenții putând fi purtători ai acestei mutații. Cel mai frecvent sindrom al acestei categorii este constituit de sindromul QT lung congenital (sunt descrise 12 tipuri în funcție de tipul canalului ionic atins). Majoritatea cazurilor sunt de tipul 1 și 2 (canalele potasice sunt cele atinse).

În 75-80% din cazuri, mecanismul de producere a morții subite cardiace îl constituie tahicardiile ventriculare maligne (fibrilație ventriculară, tahicardie ventriculară susținută), celelalte procente fiind constituite de asistolă sau de activitate electrică fără puls. (Ginghină, 2010; 725-735) La adult, fibrilația ventriculară constituie cauza cea mai frecventă de moarte subită, definindu-se printr-o activitate electrică anarhică a celulelor miocardului ventricular ce are drept rezultat o ineficiență totală a inimii de a asigura funcția circulatorie. Principalele patologii cardiace ce pot provoca o FV sunt: ischemia miocardică, valvulopatiile și cardiomiopatiile; poate rezulta și din altă tulburare de ritm, precum displazia aritmogenă a ventriculului drept sau din QT lung congenital; mai este posibilă și în caz de insuficiență respiratorie acută, de siskaliemie sau hipotermie.

Procesele fiziopatologie asociate morții subite sunt complexe, multifactoriale și încă prost cunoscute. Ca ipoteză actuală este prezentată susceptibilitatea miocardului de a dezvolta tulburări de ritm ventricular în timpul unei ischemii coronariene, susceptibilitate legată în special de un dezechilibru între sistemul autonom simpatic și parasimpatic (disautonomie cardiacă). (Huikiri, Castellanos, Myerburg, 2001; 345: 1473-82)

Aceste accidente pot fi strâns corelate cu prezența unei anomalii preexistente a traseurilor electrocardiografice pe tipul repolarizării precoce, ce ar explica o parte din morțile subite inexplicabile. De asemenea, una sau mai multe mutații genetice se află direct la originea acestei anomalii electrice, descoperire ce nu poate să nu fie apropiată de sindromul încă prost cunoscut la lui Brugada (descriș în 1992, se caracterizează prin survenirea sincoperlo sau a morții subite în raport cu tahicardiile ventriculare polimorfe la pacienți cu inima structural normală și aspect de bloc de ramură cu supradenivelare de segment ST în derivațiile precordiale drepte (V1 la V3) la ECG.(Nau, 2008;1467-1467) Aceste anomalii genetice sunt responsabile de reducerea densității curentului sodic și explică agravarea afecțiunilor electrocardiografice produse de antiaritmicele blocante ale canalelor de sodium. Pronosticul este grav la pacienții simptomatici și se bazează pe prevenția morții subite prin implantarea unui defibrilator automat. La pacienții asimptomatici, în schimb, fără antecedente familiale, decizia terapeutică este mult mai delicată.

ABSTRACT

This paper focuses on the analysis of the Trilogy from the perspective of Buddhist teachings. It argues that all the instances of failure described in the previous chapters have an echo in Buddhism through the prevailing concept of suffering seen as purification. The Buddhist concept is discussed to the extent on the representation of the Four Noble Truths as a method of explaining the narrators' failed life, rebirth as a way to attain liberation from an oppressive body, and the detachment of the mind from all conceptual models of thinking. The narrators' isolation and impossibility of movement are given meditative connotations, which allow a natural path towards enlightenment. Their failure to live is thus ennobled by their spiritual arrival at a superior level where everything they experience is in a sense a form of mental progress. The epistemology of failure in the Trilogy welcomes the opportunity for deep insight into aspects rich in philosophical, linguistic and religious aspects. This study offers a contribution to the idea that Samuel Beckett's Trilogy is a resourceful literary creation which paradoxically succeeds in achieving success through a complex approach to the theme of failure.

KEYWORDS: Buddhism, humanism, suffering, spiritual detachment, liberation, success

In Buddhist teachings (Eliade, 2007: 93) every failed or spiritually lost life on earth may be turned into a serene existence through immobility and meditation. Suffering is a purifying phase in the search for enlightenment (and thus success). Molloy, Malone and the Unnamable undergo complex instances of physical, psychological and existential suffering, which lead them to salvation. Buddhist detachment saves them through isolation and the impossibility of bodily movement. Their texts can be considered meditations meant to help them redefine themselves and their lives. In its quality as the central theme of the Trilogy, failure is the only path which can lead them towards success through detachment and an intermediate and compulsory step towards Beckett's success.

According to Paul Davies (2000: 54), Beckett's work is associated with Buddhism in the sense that it approaches the theme of the end of humanism seen in the disposal of human norms. Beckett focuses his work on the detachment from fear, desires, pleasures and hope in an attempt to avoid his characters' suffering, outlining thus the primary insights of Buddhism. Davies also affirms that there is no doubt of the fact that Beckett could perceive Buddhist teachings in depth and could understand and feel its inner aspects.

The Buddhist is likely to say of Beckett and of many other writers and artists they have seen what is simply the case. They do not need to have had the imprimatur of the Buddha to do so, any more than the contemporary artists need the permission of Derrida or Lyotard to conform to the shards of ideological historical criticism. The sky, the space of perception, is wider than that.

The Trilogy can be read under the interpretation of the Buddhist Four Noble Truths, with a complex input on death as a means of salvation. Mircea Eliade (1986/91) offers a clear view about the Four Noble Truths, saying that they represent the pure essence in Buddhist teachings. They were first mentioned by Buddha during his experience of enlightenment and they all relate to suffering – its nature, origin, cessation and the path leading to cessation.

The Four Noble Truths deal with the concept of suffering or pain. For the Buddhist, the world dominated by ignorance is full of suffering. Human experience, be it of any nature, causes suffering.

Suffering, as a noble truth is this: Birth is suffering, aging is suffering, sickness is suffering, death is suffering, sorrow and lamentation, pain, grief and despair are suffering; association with the loved is suffering, dissociation from the loved is suffering, not to get what one wants is suffering — in short suffering is the five categories of clinging objects

(Nanamoli, 1993/186)

The body means suffering because it is the place suffering resides in; senses, objects and perceptions mean suffering because they lead to suffering; the pleasure itself means suffering because it is followed by suffering. Thus, man's life in his body, whenever it is affected by desires and passions, means suffering.

David Paus (2000/108) mentions Arthur Schopenhauer's pervasive influence on Samuel Beckett's writings. For Schopenhauer, he says, "to exist was to suffer, the only course for the suffering individual was to deny his or her will to life (the blind striving force that united the body with the rest of the world)." As it can be seen, Samuel Beckett could have taken part of the Buddhist interpretations of life from Arthur Schopenhauer as he knew the concepts of Buddhism and applied them widely in his philosophy.

Gottfried Büchner (2002/115-117) also points out Schopenhauer's influence on Beckett's thinking and his literary creations:

Schopenhauer's pessimism was very close to Beckett's own, and he was to heed the three ways of enduring the misery of existence that Schopenhauer recommended: art or aesthetic contemplation, compassion, and resignation. ... Resignation, for Schopenhauer, consisted in the denial of the will-to-live that is the role of tragedy to evoke. At the moment of the tragic catastrophe, we become convinced more clearly than ever that life is a bad dream from which we have to awake. To this extent the effect of tragedy ... is the dawning of the knowledge that the world and life can afford us no true satisfaction, and are therefore no worth our attachment to them. In this the tragic spirit consists; accordingly it leads to resignation. ... complete resignation could lead to the wish to finish one's life, but whereas Beckett's protagonists reflect on suicide as a way of ending their suffering "... / they never follow through.

Buddhism encourages the complete detachment from everything and everybody who might produce suffering through their imminent presence in people's lives. Through Stopenhauer, Beckett embraces a similar idea in the Trilogy and chooses to consider that the only solution for the narrators' liberation from failure is their full abandonment in the detachment from everything which is not worth our attachment to them. One by one, Molloy, Moran, Malone and the Unnamable abandon the reality they create for their texts and reach a superior sphere – the 'enlightenment' spoken of by the Buddhists –, where there is no failed existence or suffering, but a complex understanding leading to a successful life of itself.

Samuel Beckett allowed his pessimism of linking to be carefully transmitted to the four narrators of the Trilogy and to carefully drive them towards enlightenment by an intricate developing of the theme of suffering and its effects.

Molloy's judgement also starts from the idea that the single fact of being in the world means suffering. As a man, Molloy undergoes a complex state of suffering which comes as a result of low esteem and negative judgement. He feels obliged to write an account of his most recent, unsuccessful attempt to find his mother. His writing evolves under a sense of obligation without being aware why the obligation exists. Although Molloy definitely knows he does not work for money, he is also in complete unawareness of the motif which compels him to write. Neither does he know for what he works. He continues his striving actively although he strongly despises writing and experiences the deep suffering it brings to him. Molloy results in a solitary invalid who finds writing compulsive because it is dictated by an inner voice.

If Molloy's reasons for suffering are to be analysed, it will be obvious that they are simply the results of his mental torments. He continuously tries to redefine himself as a human being through the use of memory. As he remembers fragments of his life, he struggles to put them down not in a rational manner, but rather in a way which is able to transmit his physical and mental limitation.

In his suffering, Molloy longs for salvation and, to attain this goal, he turns towards the principal idols to which human beings have looked for protection and guidance in the successive phases of their history. In Molloy, part one, this role is assumed by the figure of the mother and the various women who minister to Molloy's needs in the course of his journey. In part two, these maternal figures are replaced by Youdi and other male authority figures, including Father Ambrose, who embody the rule of paternal law. The detachment from suffering may result here in the ultimate search for initial origins.

The nature of Molloy's passions is transformed into incomplete stories, which may symbolize the product of his mind in search for a hidden wish to understand life and the suffering it causes: "The words engraved themselves for ever in my memory, perhaps because I understood them at once, a thing I didn't often do" (Molloy, 49). Nevertheless, the ultimate detachment for Molloy comes in a moment when suffering could have been expected to appear as a natural cause of events. At the recall of his first love's death, he simply says: "the indifference with which I learnt of her death /... / an indifference softened indeed by the pain of losing a source of revenue” (Molloy, 58).

This interpretation is also suited for Malone, as he is even closer to the full suffering of agony, and for the Unnamable, who resides in a special world mainly characterized by inconsistency and pain.

I don't feel very well, perhaps I'm going, that would surprise me. It is a passing weakness, everyone has experienced that. One weakness, when it passes, one's strength comes back and one resumes. That is probably what is happening to me.

(Malone Dies, 252)

In Buddhist teachings, people are told that their attachment to both objects and other human beings leads to profound suffering. Both Molloy and Malone are deeply attached to their possessions, which come to occupy a central position in their texts. Only when they succeeded in leaving them aside can spiritual detachment intervene in their minds. After having written their inventories, Molloy and Malone seem to have entered a sphere of detachment from their surrounding objects.

Thus, the analysis of these examples from the three novels of the Trilogy under the light of the Four Noble Truths leads to the following ideas based on Buddhist interpretations: the existence in this world is a great and painful illusion; the attachment to objects and, consequently, people's desires constitute the cause of all pains and suffering; pains and suffering caused by desires and the illusion of an existence may be stopped through meditation and enlightenment; enlightenment is tangible through absolute detachment and renouncement of all wishes.

Suffering has widely been classified in various categories, but there are three groups, which best define the precise type of suffering existent in the Trilogy. The first is represented by physical suffering, including disease and death. Beckett exemplifies this idea in the episode when Moran suffers from total paralysis and, at the same time, he wishfully contemplates the pleasures of total paralysis:

Such are the advantages of a total and painless paralysis. And it would not surprise me if the great classical paralyses were to offer analogous and perhaps even still more unspeakable satisfactions. To be literary incapable of motion alas that must be something.

Molloy's physical disabilities are also increased to such an extent that he is gradually reduced to crawling: “But he who moves in this way, crawling on his belly, like a reptile, no sooner comes to rest and even the very movement is a kind of rest, compared to other movements, I mean those that have worn me out” (Molloy, 90).

Molloy and Malone both suffer physical pains; this is the reason why they are compelled to remain in bed, writing while waiting to die.

Now my sick leg, I forgive which, is immaterial here, was in a condition neither to dig, because it was rigid, nor alone to support me, because it would have collapsed.

(Molloy, 35)

The second type is represented by psychological suffering, including all failures and disappointments in one's life. The narrators in the Trilogy can easily be included in this category, as they all undergo mental failure and incapacity of adjustment to a normal life. They even create failed lives for their characters and place them in a world of profound mental suffering. They often feel sad, lonely and depressed when they become aware of the fact that they are unable to satisfy their needs by themselves.

Molloy and Moran use writing as a way to recreate their mental sanity and to understand their mission in the world. Malone, on the contrary, needs to create his own world so that he might understand the rules and principles that govern it. He hopes to reframe in this way his mental perception of the real world he lives in and transform it into another, which to make him able to grasp the true nature of things. Nevertheless, his plan also implies a mental suffering: "But perhaps I shall not succeed any better than this. Perhaps as this I shall find myself abandoned, in the dark, without anything to play with" (Malone Dies, 180).

The Unnamable's psychological suffering is outlined by his necessity to go on with his continuous mental divagations in search of a non-existent self. The dialogue between the Unnamable "I" and his overwhelming tyrants displays the conception of a realm in which suffering is the norm. The torment felt by the Unnamable is described in terms of confusing scenes which fail to express complete ideas about psychological suffering, the entire feeling of the text. Neither the Unnamable, nor his characters are given the chance to avoid this type of suffering and furthermore, it is increased as time goes by and gradually affects the characters:

As long as he suffers there's hope, even though they need none, to make him suffer. But how can they know he suffers? Do they see him? They say they do. But it's impossible. Hear him? Definitely not. He makes no noise /.../ But suppose, instead of suffering less, as time flies, he continues to suffer as much, precisely, as the first day. That must be possible. And but suppose, instead of suffering less than the first day, or no less, he suffers more and more, as time flies, and the metamorphosis is accomplished, of unchangeable future into unchangeable past

(The Unnamable, 367)

The third type of suffering is exemplified by the existential suffering – people are permanently conditioned by what they know and they depend on their home, friends and their own personality. They often do not dare to approach the unknown and remain at the simplistic level of routine. The unknown is largely approached by Samuel Beckett in the Trilogy in the sense that it represents a feeling of dissatisfaction. Moran frequently writes in his report that he dislikes having to leave his home and everything related to it and start a journey into the unknown in order to find Molloy: "Thus I was able to say to Gaber, Let him give his job to someone else, I don't want it, and Gaber was able to reply, He wants it to be you" (Molloy, 107-108).

For the Buddhist, the body is nothing more than the place where evil may reside. Consequently, liberation from this prison represented by material life is to be continuously and the center of thoughts. This liberation is the greatest of all blessings and the most sublime goal. The body is not considered to be clean enough and thus unworthy of any kind of attachment. The body is also thought to cause the greatest suffering and pain and to permanently keep them together with the man who cannot detach himself from his own body. For this reason, the complete liberation from pain is only possible through a thorough detachment from body.

Malone embraces the resolution of a desired detachment from his failed body. He struggles towards death as a method to empty his body, which seems to annoy him. The body is a prison that both fails to protect and to be an instrument of help. Malone moves within the sensation that he is more and more trapped inside it and he hints at the idea that a being should not need a physical form in order to exist. Spirituality is thus put above physicality, as Buddhism advises, and, with this suggestion, Becke makes a step forward and places a slightly uniformed introduction for The Unnamable.

I am far from the sounds of blood and breath immured. ... Drowning deep down among them, I feel nothing. This here I die, unbeknown to my stupid flesh.

(Malone Dies, 186)

Rebirth represents a fundamental concept for Buddhism. The complex process of death and birth resides in an interesting Buddhist explanation, which can be found in Malone Dies. Buddhists believe that what is normally accepted as 'death' represents in essence the cessation of vital functions of the body. When the physical body loses vitality, it is no longer able to sustain the current of consciousness, which represents the mental part of the process. Nevertheless, as long as there is a perpetual wish to keep on existing and to hold on to life, the current of consciousness does not stop once the life of the body is lost. Driven by the desire to preserve its existence, it bursts out again under the shape of a new physical body, one that has just been born. Thus, rebirth takes place immediately after death (V. V. Rameswamy, 2006: 113-114).

As a human being, Malone denies himself the possibility of spiritually accepting his existential condition and begins to ask whether the possibility to acquire a new and better existence after the present one is totally finished. Becke's character would, if given a choice, opt for death, which in Malone's case could be considered synonymous with peaceful sleep and to rest a long last. Birth and death, despite being opposites, are both physically painful experiences. Still living, Malone mentally experiences his presence in his mother's womb, visualizing and feeling his own birth in the confinement of his room. Through the description of Malone's death, which literally becomes a birth into death, Becke suggests that people die completing the process of returning to the initial space the way they came in to this life. Malone feels that he is swelling, that he is about to burst.

The ceiling rises and falls, rises and falls, rhythmically, as when I was a focus. Also to be mentioned a great rise of rushing water, phenomenon mundiis mundiis perhaps analogue to that of the mirage, in the desert. The window. I shall not see it again. Why? Because, to my grief, I cannot turn my head. Leaden light again, thick, eddying, riddled with lightning channels through a brightness, perhaps I should say air, sucking air. All is ready. Expect me. I am being given, if I may venture the expression, birth into death, such is my impression. The feet are clear already, of the great sun of existence.

 Favourable presentation I trust My head will be the last to die. Haul in your hands. I can't The render rend My story ended I'll be living yet Promising lag. That is the end of me. I shall say no more.

(Malone Dies, 283)

For Malone, however, death is an easy way out since it provides tranquillity from the burdens of life. So both life and its cause, birth, are painful in a way that death is not. Birth is the beginning and the end. It is the beginning of pain and the end of peace. On a different level, Malone might assume his earthly death as a new beginning, as a clear-sighted new birth. He is somehow suspended between the life he hardly can live in this world and the life he might be able to obey and lead in a different sphere, after having completed his present duty.

Yes, an old foe, this whole world I am now, hoar and impotent mother is done for, I've rolled her, she'll drop me with the help of gangrene, perhaps papa is all the party too, I'll land headforemost mewling in the charnel-house, no, I'll Ill mewl, no, I won't die
 (Malone Dies, 225)

As in many ideas that Malone develops and seems deeply convinced of, this idea has its opposite counterpart: "I shall never get born and therefore never get dead" (Malone Dies, 225). The Buddhist notion of this same concept could imply leads to the concept of "dying-in-life", a possibility Malone simply speculates to spiritually exist. Malone genuinely fails to accomplish his inner desire to close the circle of life and step out of it as physical restraints prevent it: "If I had use of my body, I would throw it out of the window" (Malone Dies, 218). Malone has no strength to take his own life, for he is not in control of his actions. His 'mind' and 'body' in relation is central to an understanding of a mental wish to die, coupled with a physical inability to carry it through. This idea perfectly fits in to the Cartesian fashion, where the mind gives orders which the body is unable to obey. He remains motionless with no other possibility but to move his mind for his body and to reach, by the power of thought and deep psychological analysis, where his spirit desperately needs to rest.

Buddhism sees incarnation as a spiritual embodiment in flesh. It refers to the conception and birth of a human being as a material completion of an entity whose original manifestation is immaterial. In the Buddhist tradition, an incarnation is a deceased person's rebirth into a superior human being. Though volition and wish are very powerful during lifetime, but they become predominant feelings at death time and they condition the next birth. Buddhist teachings of the non-self imply that there is no fixed soul that occupies a body, has its determinacy within it and then, at the death of the body, moves to another one. On the contrary, Buddhist teachings sustain the fact that a soul has the need to reincarnate in order to be able to get born again and improve its existence.

Malone is experiencing the agony of incarnation, the agony of being in a body. He needs to find his way out and, in his exhaustion, he lacks physical aid and spiritual determination to do it peacefully. The spirit of failure that surrounds this novel might also be a consequence of an unfulfilled normal process of dying. In the very first lines of the story a wide circle of Malone's agony is opened and left aside in its unpolished form while the narrator feels the need to justify the remaining time by exposing parts of his memory. He sometimes feels he is already dead and his thoughts and feelings merge randomly outside his body:

There is naturally another possibility that does not escape me, though it would be a great disappointment to have it confirmed, and that is that I am dead already and that all continues more or less as when I was not

While meditating about the troubles of his self, Malone wonders whether the present world is not wholly in his mind.

You may say it is all in my head, and indeed sometimes it seems to me I am in a head and that these eight, no, six, these six planes that enclose me are of solid bone. But then, to conclude the head is mine, no, never.

(Malone Dies, 221)

The origin of suffering can be identified within the wish which determines reincarnations. This deep wish is always looking for new satisfactions, such as the wish to satisfy the pleasures of senses, the wish to perpetuate and the wish to self-annihilate. The wish of self-annihilation can lead to suicide and, consequently, it is often considered to have negative influences on people. Suicide is not something unfamiliar with the Trilogy's narrators, as they often take it as a salvation from their hard life.

While wandering around the town after his encounter with Lousse, Molloy attempts unsuccessfully to commit suicide in order to end his pains. "But the thought of suicide had little hold on me. I don't know why, I thought I did, but I see I don't" (Molloy, 78). Malone also wishes to escape through suicide into a less painful existence. Unlike Molloy, however, this is not a particular novel; Malone just starts writing at a given moment and stops only when death holds his hand. It is soon made clear under what conditions he is working: "I could die today, if I wished, merely by making a little effort. But it is just as well to let myself die, quietly, without rushing things" (Malone Dies, 179). Molloy, on the other hand, was not allowed to die, having to write his text for the man who collected them. Nevertheless, Malone assumes he might be Molloy's reincarnation in the following words: "Something must have changed. I will not weigh upon the balance any more, one way or the other. I shall be neutral and inert I shall die tepid, without enthusiasm" (Malone Dies, 179).

Losing the comfort of his home and also the perspective of getting them back in a near future, Moran begins to experience the longing for death more and more intensely. As a result, the idea of suicide starts invading his mind and soul. Having built a fire one night for warmth, he thinks of the pleasures of his burning himself to death: "and in the end, overcome with heat and weariness, I lay down on the ground near the fire and fell asleep. Perhaps a spark will set fire to my clothes and I wake a living torch" (Molloy, 147).

Suicidal thoughts drive Moran towards the incapacity to accept his life and his human condition. Although he has better capacities of thought and movement than Molloy, he experiences a great dissatisfaction with their outcomes in real life. Moran is a failed man because he chooses to be so, whereas Molloy is doomed even from his birth to accept his incapacities of leading a normal life. Both Molloy and Moran undergo a process of transformation from people in mere living entities who will only accomplish something the moment they end their human existence and move to the realm of death. In order to obtain illumination, a Buddhist has to find both the detachment from the cycle of reincarnations and the detachment from his present life and the actions he has to complete in it. The present life is thus the result of the deeds done in the previous lives and at the same time it has a genuine influence on the next existence. For Malone, the present life might be a transitory way towards self-understanding as he feels detached from the outer world and from its people as if he were watching them disantly and recording their acts:

In a word there seems to be the light of the outer world, of those who know the sun and moon emerge a little an hour and a little another plunge again below the surface, and who rely on this, and who knows that clouds are always to be expected but sooner or later always pass away, and mine. ... The noises too, cries, steps, doors, murmurs, cease for whole days, their days.

Malone's mental concretization of life makes him create a unique universe in which he is the essence backing the closure of an epoch and facing the representation of a different one. This stage might be considered his agony, the period when the soul has left the body and makes the object of the combination of the two worlds.

The Buddhist meditation implies isolation, a certain immobilization of the body, an intended discipline of thought and a careful breathing control based on a regular sequence. The next phase of meditation is represented by getting into the sphere of the subconscious and pure contemplation. The one who meditates is now fully detached from his proper senses and focuses on one of the three characteristics of existence: the impermanence, the non-ego and the pain.

The climax of the meditation presupposes the attention to a space which represents the limit between the consciousness and the unconsciousness, a kind of transcendence at the border of the ephemeral world. Nevertheless, this state of mind does not also represent the moment of experiencing high spirituality, as meditation alone is not able to provide enlightenment.

In Malone Dies, one enters the period of modern individualism, in which, unshielded from dependence, Malone ("man alone") looks vainly to himself for the guidance that others had formerly provided. Being isolated in a limited space, his room, and having no possibility whatsoever to move, Malone resides in thinking and using his memory in order to attain spiritual freedom. He has a distinguished intention to report what he sees as he comes upon it in the same way Molloy and Moran had done, as he needs to provide utility to the spare time he has. In his writing process, Malone feels as if he were playing a game never knowing where he is going to because of his lack of control over what happens. "And I call that playing. /... / Already I forgot what I have said. That is not how to play" (Malone Dies, 189).

But between the intercourses of his game, mainly introduced by "Whaledium", Malone cannot avoid admitting that he can hopefully be his own company. This desperate attempt at curing his solitude left him no alternative but to turn inward, to look for company inside himself instead of outside. To this end he abandoned the world around him in favour of the world within him. As he now discovers, his commitment to himself and to the unknowable, a strategy inimical to a game of ready-made forms, has left him quite as much alone as before. So long as each move is still a search for something other than the pleasure of the search itself, Malone is still playing with and involved in representation.

The Unnamable is also capable of admitting his impossibility of movement "But the days of the sticks are over, here I can count on my body alone, my body incapable of the smallest movement" (The Unnamable, 300- 301).

Mircea Eliade (2006: 25-29) makes a generous presentation of the Buddhist idea that suffering is the only way towards liberation. Suffering in itself has no value for the world if it cannot lift the heavy weight of pain from the shoulders of humanity. At the basis of the philosophy of pain is man's wish to see himself free from the torments produced by a triad of suffering: the suffering caused by gods, the suffering caused by nature and the inner or organic suffering.

In the Trilogy, God affects Molloy, Moran, Moran's son and Malone for the mere reason that He permits them to be born and to be obliged thus to pass through all the suffering of life. The Unnamable's detachment from any kind of deity might be his own making himself a god for Worm and Mahood. Nature is always Moran's pursuer, a real character in the text participating in the discourse and having a truly powerful delineation mostly for Moran.

The branch was thick and full of sap and did not burn when I stuck it in the fire. I held it by the thin end. The crackling of the fire, of the writhing brands rather, for fire triumphant does not crackle, but makes an altogether different noise, had permitted the man to come right up to me, without my knowledge. If there is one thing infuriates me it is being taken myself by surprise. I continued then, in spite of my spasm of fright, hoping it had passed unnoticed, to poke the fire as if I were alone.

Inner and organic suffering provides an opportunity for the realization of life's uselessness in a world of unselected activities. The Unnamable becomes aware of his incapacity to engage in an identity so that he might be able to live. In this light, his present state is thus futile and it offers meaningless connotations upon his already confusing existence. At one point in his monologue, he tries to give a sense to his life through thinking and the possibility to transmit his thoughts when he says:

No, perhaps I'll say it even with their language, for me alone, so as not to have not lived in vain, and so as to go silent, if that is what confers the right to silence, and it's unlikely, it's they who have silence in their gift, they who decide, the same old gang, among themselves, no matter, whether with silence, I'll say what I am, so as not to have been born for nothing.

The Unnamable's inner suffering is emphasized by his own discourse only to finally find himself detached from everything surrounding environment, worms and characters. Common suffering represents an alienation from oneself, from one's fellow man, and from nature; the awareness that life runs out of one's hand like sand, and that one will die without having lived; that one lives in the midst of plenty and yet is joyless. Through the ability to find detachment, the Unnamable proves to have reached a superior sphere which might be compared to the enlightenment of Zen Buddhism.

Although Samuel Beckett denied in various occasions his familiarity with Zen Buddhism, he was considered to have an innate knowledge of its teachings. Lawrence Shainberg (1987: 2) offers a generous explanation of this idea:

No a few critical opinions had been mustered over the years concerning his debt to Buddhism, Taoism, Zen and the Noh theater, all of it received [...] with curiosity and approval and absolute denial by the man I presumed to explain. 'I know nothing about Buddhism', he said. 'If it's present in the play, it is unknown to me'. Once this had been asserted, however, there remained the possibility of unconscious predilection, innate Buddhism, so to speak. For years I'd been studying Zen and its particular form of sitting meditation, and I'd always been struck by the parallels between its practice and Beckett's work. In fact I came [...] it seemed quite impossible that he didn't have some explicit knowledge, perhaps even direct experience, of Zen, and I had asked him about it the very first night at his hotel. He answered me [...] he knew nothing of Zen at all.

An obvious presence of Zen Buddhism in Beckett's work is also outlined by Paul Foster (2006) in Beckett and Zen – A Study of Dilemma in the Novels of Samuel Beckett. He analyzes Beckett's presentation of the meaning of existence, human mind, suffering and the chance of salvation by applying the concepts of Zen Buddhism in his prose.

Zen means people's ability to know themselves and to become satisfied with what they are. It means to find the permanent source of vital energy that bursts from the most profound spheres of the human being. Taisen Deshimaru (1993: 146) states that the true Zen or the eternal truth can find their existence only based on human personality. If they want to acquire the veritable Zen, people must find their proper spirit by simply sitting in the correct position. This is the only way towards the discovery of the pure ego; it presumes that sitting in meditation itself (i.e. zazen) is an expression of Buddha nature.

The Zen method means to attain detachment of mind from all conceptual models of thinking and perceive reality directly. Mircea Eliade (2007: 107) affirms that in Zen Buddhism, enlightenment is believed to exist within people even from their birth; the only thing which must be done by people is to let it arise. The way towards enlightenment is the final stage and the benefits of this state may be felt only when a complete death men can be obtained. Practitioners of Zen believe that enlightenment, the awakening of the Buddha-mind or Buddha-nature, is people's natural state, but has been covered over by layers of negative emotions and distorted thoughts.

The complete death men and the enlightenment for the Unnamable appear in his numerous instances of self-isolation and retreat. Beckett demonstrates here his pervasive intention to emphasize death men and solitude as pre-requisites to concentration. If the Unnamable is considered to be concentrated during the entire monologue, then the existence of his ultimate death men is to be seen between the lines: "I'll concentrate again /... / Slough off this mortal inertia, it is out of place, in this society" (The Unnamable, 333).

In Buddhist death men, the soul reaches such superior spheres that it grasps the meanings and sensations of non-human ability to understand. This is an instance of personal liberation and the accomplishment of a unique state of mind. The Unnamable reaches death men the moment he resides in the struggle to attain enlightenment as a moment of revelation with regard to everything that precedes it. Thus, the connection of the three texts of the Trilogy may be read as a continuous search for death men, starting with Molloy and his personal failure to live, continuing with Moran's inability to fulfil two tasks – the one exterior to him, that of finding Molloy, and the inner one, that of finding the Molloy inside himself – passing through an intermediary phase represented by Malone before the final death men attained only by the Unnamable.

There is another sequence of Zen Buddhism interpretation in The Unnamable. Samuel Beckett uses the recurring image of the circle in the third novel of the Trilogy, which could be read as representing the Unnamable's entire universe under the form of Zen ideals of simplicity and spontaneity. Yasunari Takahashi (2002) begins his study On Mindlessness: Beckett, Japan and the Twentieth Century by making an increasing presentation of the philosophy of the Zen circle and by pointing out the relational ideas he interchanged with Beckett himself on the matter:

Invited to come to his [Beckett's] flat on boulevard Saint-Jacques, I took the liberty of presenting him with a volume of Zen art that included a few drawings of circles. Zen priests like to draw a simple circle with one swift sweep of a Chinese ink brush, often with an epigram or a poem inscribed beside it. The circle is interpreted as a symbol of the idea of mushin (mu is a prefix negating the word that follows it; shin signifies 'mind', so that mushin translates as 'no-mind', or 'the state of being without mind'). It is supposed that only those monks who have attained satori (i.e. 'enlightenment in Buddhist philosophy) are able to draw a beautiful circle with due spontaneity. ... I was glad the attention Beckett paid to these circles, because, as I told him then, I was particularly interested in the circular metaphors or structures to be found ubiquitously in his works. Having listened to my explanation, Beckett smiled and said: "But I can't draw a circle like these." Undoubtedly, Beckett would be the last person to aim enlightenment for himself, even if he would have very much liked to do away with the mind altogether, just like an ideal Zen monk. (38-39).

The Unnamable is a proof of Samuel Beckett's unrecognized exemplification of a Zen-like "no mind" state. The circle appears throughout the Unnamable's discourse under different aspects, offering a complete image of a monologue without a pre-established anterior judgement which to fix it in an unalterable explanation.

There are two moments in The Unnamable when the Circle is mentioned as a mindless "family Circle." The first one hints at Mahood's estrangement and self-isolation from an understanding of family: "he remembers the exact spot in the garden and the kind of life he led here before joining the family Circle" (The Unnamable, 324). The second one is represented by the Unnamable's metaphorical use of the word "Circle", which has high imaginative connotations. It implies again the security of a family, security which the Unnamable is totally deprived of from the very beginning of the novel. Here, he seems to strive for the "intimacy" a family could provide even if, at the end of this fragment, a touch of disappointment is to be felt: "Let us keep to the family Circle, it's more intimate. We all know one another now, no surprises to be feared. The will has been opened, nothing for anybody" (The Unnamable, 375).

The Unnamable himself seems to be in the middle of an unclear Circle with profound implications: "To lose to me is grey, dimly transparent, and beyond that the armed Circle deepens and spreads its fine impervious veils" (The Unnamable, 300). The suggestion of this statement leads to an application of judgement-free entrapment on both mental and physical terms: "For a collar, fixed to the mouth of the jar, now encircles my neck, just below the chin" (332).

There is also an image of circular movement denoting the Unnamable's high preoccupation with Circles which suggests the repetitive cycle of nature and life:

If I could be in a forest, caught in a thicket, or wandering round in Circles, it would be the end of this blither, I'd describe the leaves, one by one, at the moment of their growing, at the moment of their giving shade, at the moment of their falling.

(The Unnamable, 399)

The Circle image in The Unnamable is interpreted, according to Zen Buddhism, as mindlessness exemplification. This implies that the entire monologue goes round in Circles in a complete death of the mind. The Unnamable starts and finishes in the same place and in the same atmosphere, without any progression: "Where now? Who now? When now? Unquestioning. I, say I. Unbelieving" (291); "where I am, I don't know, I'll never know, in the silence you don't know, you must go on, I can't go on, I'll go on" (414). The "no mind" circularity is also pointed out by Robert Hampigny (1975: 122) in terms of the structural approach: "words are killed with words, which in turn need words to kill them. Since, however, there needs to be a last word, it will be 'I'll go on'."

Through Buddhist death men thus Beckel's narrators are saved from a failed existence. Since they are already physically isolated and partially immobile, they suffice in completely isolating themselves at the spiritual level, too. Their texts may be the mere product of their minds' meditation in search of an escape from the suffering they have to endure. Consequently, failure is turned into success for the Trilogy's narrators.

In the same spirit studying failure is its deepest sides, Charles Manz (2002: 38) considers that failure is a real fuel for success. He sees that on a piece of paper, failure looks like a hole; turning the paper upside down, though, we can see the mountain of success. It's all a matter of perspective. By use of such ideas, failure is redefined and seen as a passable moment in the way towards successes. He considers the almost-successes one might have in a lifetime happen thanks to the power of failure. This idea has its most applicable in Beckett's Trilogy if we are to consider that the writer built a novel of success on approaching different aspects of the theme of failure.

Our study, which aims, among other, Francophone and its problems of recent decades, offers a look about Sonia Kaleva Anguelova, a Bulgarian-born writer of modern Canada, and her novel Abécédaire des années d'exil, an even's story about her life after the escape from the Bulgaria of the 70s.

We shall talk about her situation of refugee from a former communist country, meeting both language and social and cultural difficulties in the context of her newly adopted country. The characters and even's come together and relate to each other, difficult situations are upsetting the flow of time; her love and disappointment, the friendship of the others interpose in a quite different atmosphere. Exile becomes a bridge that allows men to bring them to a new one.

Introduction

Si nous nous proposons de parler de la littérature québécoise d'expression française, ou plutôt de la littérature québécoise et de son contexte plurilingue, nous devons parler premièrement d'une littérature francophone qui, pour faire valoir son importance, a beaucoup lutté contre la suprématie de l'anglais sur son territoire. D'arrefour de cultures et de mentalités, cette nouvelle littérature s'impose par la diversité de ses sujets, par la sensibilité d'expression de ses écrivains, nés ou exilés de tous les coins du monde.

Dans cette atmosphère d'amalgame de cultures et de langues, Sonia Kaleva Anguelova, écrivaine d'origine bulgare, réfugiée de son pays natal depuis 1970, publie en 2001 son premier ouvrage, *Abécédaire des années d'exil*¹, qui dessente de ses problèmes d'exil, de ses amours et de ses déceptions, de ses questions sur la démocratie et la liberté. Même si nous ne sommes pas devant un roman, dans le vrai sens du mot mais devant un récit de vie (la vie d'une Bulgare exilée au Québec, les temps du communisme), nous observons la radiographie d'une société où l'écrivaine rencontre des difficultés langagières que sociales et culturelles dans le contexte de son nouveau pays d'adoption. Elle nous présente donc, comme dans un véritable abécédaire (livre de chevet à la portée de ceux qui ont connu l'exil) des personnages et des événements qui se rapportent les uns aux autres ; elle nous raconte aussi des situations sans issues qui viennent bouleverser la trame de sa vie sur un territoire, autre que le sien. Amoureuse de sa propre culture et langue, elle a fait quand même connaissance des cultures espagnole et latino-américaine lorsqu'elle était à La Havane, mais elle écrit le roman de vie en français, langue qui lui permet de parler librement de ses expériences et de son nouveau pays d'adoption.

L'exil, selon les dictionnaires, est un « (...) état (social, psychologique, politique...) d'une personne, (...) qui, volontairement ou non, a quitté sa patrie, sous la contrainte d'un bannissement ou d'une déportation, (...) d'une persécution », personne qui « vit dans un pays étranger » et se confronte à des « contraintes sociales spécifiques (langue, insertion, identité...) et souffre d'un sentiment d'éloignement de la patrie (nostalgie, déracinement...)»².

La notion d'exil a évolué de sa valeur à charge romantique du XIX^e siècle ou à charge politique du XX^e siècle, si spécifique pour les personnalités célèbres qui ont connu une terre d'asile, à une valeur plus commune destinée aux anonymes obligés de chercher la vie parmi les autres, ceux d'une autre race que leurs ancêtres. L'exilé est vu à travers sa « dimension anthropologique », comme individualité déterminée par un « (...) sentiment de dépaysement » par « (...) des contraintes sociales, économiques et politiques inhérentes à l'exil»³.

Pour Sonia Kaleva Anguelova, jeune adolescente anonyme au moment de sa décision, l'exil, qui est volontaire d'ailleurs et implique une contrainte devient un pont qui relie les mentalités, les coutumes et les habitudes d'un art en pays pour être rattachés ensuite à un nouveau pays. Elle nous parle donc, dans l'Abécédaire des années d'exil, écrit dans la langue de son exil, de ses expériences langagières, sociales (politiques) et culturelles rencontrées lors de son refuge, voulu, au Canada.

1.1. Difficultés langagières

Sonia Anguelova s'est enfuie de sa Bulgarie natale dès 1970, à près une première expérience vécue, à La Havane (de 16 à 19 ans à l'occasion du travail de son père), pour arriver finalement au Canada, territoire complètement différent et même langue, mentalités et contexte social. Le premier problème auquel elle se confronte, est naturellement la nouvelle langue.

Mais elle est une autodidacte. Arrivée sur ce nouveau territoire, le Canada, elle apprend la nouvelle langue, le français, en écrivain et en pianiste moscovite des phrases, en étouffant le souffle, l'âme de celle-ci. Elle a réussi ainsi à pénétrer la coquille dure de l'exil et la langue de l'autre.

1.1.1. La nouvelle langue

Immigrée d'un pays de culture slave, elle éprouve beaucoup de difficultés du point de vue de l'accent même si l'espagnol, appris à la Havane, l'aide en quelques sortes : « Accent : Au début, je croyais que l'accent disparaîtrait. Peu à peu. Avec le temps.

A force de se frotter aux accents de différentes régions (...) Au début, je voulais qu'il disparaisse. Plongée au plus profond du territoire du Québec, j'ai fait taire les autres langues. La première, la maternelle, et les autres, celles que j'apportais dans mes bagages. Des langues que je déportais. (...) » (p. 9).

Sonia se rend très bien compte qu'une nouvelle langue s'apprend dans un contexte vivant en parlant et dire et même aux autres mais, en même temps, en oubliant tous les autres langues apprises pour que l'accent du pays d'origine ne résiste plus

La langue n'est pas comme le vin. Enfermé, mis en bouteille, il mûrit, devient meilleur.

Une langue enfermée perd sa couleur, son goût s'efface. Une langue a besoin d'être scotchée au grand vent. Une langue a besoin d'un coup de langue. De claquer dans la bouche comme linge mouillé au vent.

Les mots ont besoin de respirer. De jouer. Dans des moulins à paroles.

Et il se peut qu'après les avoir sortis de l'encre du dictionnaire ou du parking de la mémoire, après les avoir scotchés au grand vent, on trouve des mots, des expressions démodées, hors d'usage. Des mots en train alors au musée de la langue.

(Ibidem)

Même si elle fait des efforts désespérés en vue de faire disparaître l'accent comme il résiste encore, elle a la sensation que ce lui-ci lui rappelle sans cesse sa situation d'immigrante : « Dans cette langue que j'ai apprise ici, l'accent demeure. Aussitôt la bouche ouverte, le premier mot envolé avant même d'avoir entendu mon nom. On me demande : Pouvez-vous épeler ? On m'identifie épelée. Depuis plus de dix ans j'épelle. » (p. 10)

Tous les réduits finalement à la « couleur particulière » d'une langue, c'est-à-dire, à son accent (p. 116). Ses jugements sont assez durs, sa révolte est vive ; ce n'est pas donc un problème d'accent qui l'identifie parmi les autres Canadiens mais la réaffirmation des autres à la rencontre d'un Autre : « (...) J'ai appris depuis longtemps les noms des gens d'ici. Quand apprendra-t-on le mien ? » (p. 10) ; Immigrante : Pendant combien de temps vais-je m'identifier par cette appellation ? » (p. 56).

Si elle a le courage d'appartenir à un nouveau pays, parlant une nouvelle langue (qu'elle ne maîtrise pas encore trop bien, v. Journal, p. 60), si elle a le courage de devenir une des leurs, eux, les autres, ils ne l'ont pas. Epeler reste leur mot d'ordre.

1.1.2. La langue des ancêtres

« Plongée » (p. 9) dans un nouveau pays qui ne la rejette pas mais qui ne l'assimile point, Sonia pense toujours dans son ancienne langue, celle de ses ancêtres. Elle se réfugie l'étravaine, aux moments de sa détresse sentimentale ou existentielle : « C'est en chantant que je me suis consolée dans les moments difficiles ; des chants bulgares dans les premières années d'exil » (p. 116).

L'accent même de sa fille en est un autre un exemple car les actions les plus simples ou les plus profondes, elle ne les pense qu'en bulgare :

Accouchement : Madame, madame, réveillez-vous ! M'entendez ?

- Koi mi govori ? Kadé sam ?...

- Madame, m'entendez-vous ?

Oui, mais je ne peux pas parler... Je suis loin, tellement loin... (p. 11).

La langue de son pays est celle qui revient sans cesse, même sous forme de définitions génériques : « Jivot : Vie dans ma langue maternelle » (p. 59), Otchaianié : Mot bulgare pour exprimer le désespoir. » (p. 82) ou de simples mots chargés de nostalgie : « Bozà, buisson faite de millet fermenté. Boisson de mes années bulgares » (p. 19) « Nous disons l'inverse : Noire Mer. Tcherno moré » (p. 30).

Pour elle, la langue maternelle est un organisme vivant qui a un avenir au moment de la libération du pays : « Des pays conquis, soumis à la langue des colonisateurs comme le fut ma langue maternelle, qui a vécu cinq cents ans en captivité, comme la langue s'exprime-t-elle une fois libérée ? » (p. 116).

Mais c'est les autres langues d'adoption qui définissent son propre devenir, c'est la réalité à laquelle elle a fait appel tout au long de sa vie : « Langues : Je m'endors en espagnol, tire la couverture des rêves en bulgare, ferme les yeux sur la « nacht » allemande, et vacillent les couleurs de la langue québécoise. » (p. 63).

Pour elle, chaque voix est « (...) porteuse d'un langage. Chaque langue – le français, l'anglais, l'espagnol, l'arabe, le russe, l'allemand – demande un réajustement vocal » (pp. 115-116). Toute langue a un attachement particulier ou une « couleur particulière » (p. 116), l'importance de la faire vivre, de la chanter, d'entendre « sa voix » intérieure (Ibidem), de s'abreuver à « son souffle » (Ibidem) : « (...) Une langue transportée, transposée, imposée à un peuple, sur un autre territoire, ne peut pas rester la même » (Ibidem). Elle évolue avec ceux qui la parlent qui y croient

Ecrire devient alors pour Sonia Anguelova un nouveau moyen d'existence, une modalité de faire surgir les mots, d'apprendre, d'aimer, de plonger dans la nouvelle langue choisie pour son exil :

Ecrire : (...) Lire et relire au moins de fois les mots que j'aime. (...) L'amour écrit autre visage de l'amour, donné à voir, à découvrir, à savourer. Et quand l'amour est parlé, ces mots ne sont plus que feuilles sèches dans l'herbier du cœur. (p. 32)

Jaser : Quand on veut aborder des sujets sérieux, on veut se parler, quand on veut juste s'engager sur le temps qu'il fait parler de tout et de rien, on jase. (p. 59)

1.2. Difficultés politiques/sociales

Si Sonia Anguelova réussit à s'appropriier la nouvelle langue du territoire d'adoption, elle se pose en outre des questions d'ordre politique ou social, complexe venu le fait qu'elle est une réfugiée d'un pays ex-communiste. Elle compare sans cesse l'idéal de démocratie ou de liberté, notions si étrangères pour son ancien pays, à la réalité canadienne à laquelle elle se confronte.

1.2.1. La démocratie

L'immigrante Sonia Anguelova vient d'un pays où l'idée de démocratie n'existait pas ; c'est justement pour cette raison qu'elle a librement choisi l'exil en qui elle Bulgarie n'aurait pas. Mais au final, la définition du terme semble changer pour elle. Dans une discussion avec son amie Odele, Sonia expose ses idées vis-à-vis du problème de la démocratie, vue à travers les yeux d'une réfugiée politique. Elle se considère en quelques sortes une privilégiée qui ne peut pas se soulever sur ceux qui ont décidé de l'accueillir. Mais, la fête internationale de la femme, à laquelle elle a participé, s'est transformée en désastre des arrestations pour les gars et des gaz pour les femmes :

Démocratie (et illusions perdues) :

Sonya : Je ne sais pas si tu vas comprendre, mais je suis devant un dilemme. Je vais essayer de t'en faire part. Tu sais, avant ce événement, inimaginable pour moi, je travaillais fermement à habiter un pays extraordinaire. Un pays juste, démocratique. Ça s'est d'ailleurs pour ça que j'ai choisi le Canada comme terre d'exile. (...) Au début, je me disais que tu parlais en français que militairement que c'était juste de l'idéologie ! (...) J'aimais croire que la fête internationale des femmes allait se terminer par des arrestations ? Quand je suis partie, à sept heures du soir, avec mes enfants, fatiguée, tout était normal. (p. 27)

Sonya : (...) Quand je pense que c'est devant les mêmes policiers que je suis allée parler de la violence faite aux femmes !

Odele : Ils ne s'en sont pris qu'aux gars. Nous, les femmes, on nous a dispersées par des moyens plus doux.

Sonya : Les substances qui brûlent les yeux, les gaz, tu appelles ça des moyens doux ? (pp. 27-28)

Elle s'imaginait le Canada comme un pays où les droits des citoyens sont respectés, image qui a donné d'ailleurs un sens à son exil, mais elle y découvre toute une autre réalité :

Sonya : Je pensais qu'ici on était libre de faire partie des organismes ou partis politiques.

Odele : Oui, bien sûr, tu as le droit mais, démocratiquement pas, le gouvernement veut connaître ses opposants.

Sonya : Pour moi, c'est difficile de gueuler contre ce gouvernement. N'ai-je pas été attaquée ici à titre de réfugiée politique ? (p. 28)

Sans le vouloir, elle compare les répressions de son pays et celles qui ont bouleversé son image sur la démocratie canadienne et son système de valeurs :

Sonya : Explique-moi quelle est la différence entre la répression dans les pays du Bloc de l'Est et ici ?

Odele : Peu être qu'ici nous avons les moyens de nous défendre.

Sonya : Ça s'est vrai que chez nous il ne peut pas y avoir de groupes de défense des droits et il n'y aura jamais un avocat qui n'osera s'attaquer à l'État.

Odele : La répression ici est plus subtile (...) Personne d'ici n'aurait voulu se mouiller, se mettre à dos de gros noms (p. 29).

Elle a donc une vision de plus en plus amère : « Sonya : On dirait que pendant neuf ans j'ai vécu dans un pays inventé. Décidément, je n'apprendrai jamais. Depuis ma leçon à Prague, je devrais être plus méfiante » (ibidem).

1.2.2. L'avenir=L'exil

Pour Sonia Anguelova, l'exil est une partie intégrante de son devenir, de son existence future. Il est la porte ouverte vers une autre réalité, soit qu'elle soit dure ou non, vers une autre mentalité, vers d'autres problèmes, plus complexes. La définition qu'elle donne au mot exil, par des phrases courtes, elliptiques, suggère, en même temps, l'espoir, le courage qui ont marqué sous ceux qui ont décidé de tenter l'horizon de l'inconnu ; d'ailleurs l'année invoquée, 1989, la date de la chute du communisme dans les pays de l'Est de l'Europe, parle de la détermination de ceux partis à la quête de leur liberté :

Trente septembre 1989. Deux mille cinq cents Est-Allemands. Corps à corps. Deux mille cinq cents dans la cour de l'ambassade à Prague. Non pas prisonniers, mais en quête de liberté. Sans patrie. Sans bagages. Un garçon, deux petites mains agrippées aux barreaux, attend. Sans pleurs. Sans impatience. Deux mille cinq cents corps en un seul. Six cents autres à Varsovie. Première vague se déversant vers des terres d'espoir. Vers l'exil. (p. 36)

Sonia voulait fuir un pays qui était sous l'influence « rouge » du « château fort », le Urss (p. 106). Elle ne le décrit qu'en employant la métaphore, qu'en augmentant sa force et son influence dans l'antécommuniste :

Urss / Au début était un grand pays. Immense. Sec et mystérieux. N'en ai pas qui vécu dans ce pays. Les regards se heurtaient aux murs. (...) Tous croyaient la forteresse invincible. Leur force était dans le secret. Le secret derrière les murs. Leur force était dans la discipline. Leur force était dans l'uniforme. L'uniformité. Tous pareils. Tous pour un. Tous devant l'Un. Anonymes. En rang. Ils paraient accueillir les fruits, faire les révoltes, une chanson aux lèvres / « J'aime mon pays, le plus grand, le plus fort, l'invisible ». Il n'y avait pas de faibles, pas de forces tous pareils sous le drapeau rouge. Tous pareils ? (Ibidem)

Elle se rappelle très bien les événements même si, les dernières années du communisme, elle les a vécus en exilée. Il était un pays qui était les « atrocités », ses « morts », ses « fous » ; une « peur » constante détruisait son peuple ; on voyait partout « la corruption » des grands du jour, « le mensonge » de toutes leurs actions (Ibidem) mais personne n'en parlait pas. Il était un pays qui limitait tout, qui ne demandait que de l'obéissance, un pays en total désaccord avec l'homme et son idéal de connaître et de se connaître. L'idée de remplacer « (...) les murs de pierre par des murs de verre » (Ibidem) n'a fait qu'augmenter la erreur / voir à l'extérieur signifiait voir à l'intérieur aussi, « Regarder jusque dans leur intimité » (Ibidem).

Une fois le pays libéré, Sonia voit tout à fait différemment l'ouverture vers l'ouest et la porte ouverte, offerte après la révolution de 1989, n'a fait que détruire l'âme la plus pure de ses habitants au nom de l'exploration de ce nouveau continent appelé suggestivement « la liberté » :

Il est un continent à explorer. A mesurer. Il faut pour ce faire de l'habitude. A palper. Les tissus rudes des vêtements. A analyser. L'air et l'eau. A sentir. A la loupe. Le pain. Les œufs. Demander / « combien ? » Un continent à explorer.

Des aventuriers déguisés en journalistes, sociologues, ethnologues (...) se lancèrent en la découverte avec leur caméra et leur magnéto, les deux pieds dans la boue, scrutant les visages blêmes des femmes et des vieux aux filets de provisions, essayant de tirer quelques mots d'un paquet de gare ou du savon importé. (Ibidem)

L'intrêce de ceux qui sont parés à la découverte des pays excommuniés ne vise pas la découverte d'un art en nonnence d'un pays au seuil de sa nouvelle existence mais le sensationnel : les aléiques, les fous, les gens pauvres, les mendiants, les sans-abri, les affamés, les enfants exploités (qui existent quand même partout dans le monde entier) (pp. 107-108).

Mais cet événement qui a bouleversé un pays, a eu une importance à parer ces nations on repris ton nstence de leur propre langue, de leur identité de leurs habitudes et toutes si chères mais oubliées dans le trouble des temps écoulés : « Des voix aux intonations différentes se firent entendre. On se regarda droit dans les yeux. On vit les différences (...) On osa sortir des vieux habits colorés, on dépoussiéra des mots oubliés : découverte de soi, de ses émotions, de sa personnalité, de ses responsabilités, marché libre et propriété privée. » (p. 108)

D'un œil critique, Sonia Anguelova voit la fausse piété des étrangers qui ne cherchent que de nouvelles possibilités de faire valoir leur soin envers l'autre, en imposant leur manière de vie ou leurs mentalités à un peuple oublié du monde et des autres, vivant au rythme de ses antécédents :

Avant, vous portiez le pays et ils étaient des millions. (...) Ils ne savaient pas comment se tenir debout habitués à se soutenir les uns les autres. Ils ne savaient pas comment se tenir debout tout en étant différents les uns les autres. (...) Avant, le monde entier se sentait humilié par l'extension, l'imposante figure du pays, par son ombre. Avec la transparence de ses murs et les visages libres, voilà que le géant est devenu un gros chat domestiqué. (...) Ils se voyaient petitement habillés, mal coiffés, mal éduqués à côté de ces étrangers qui sont bien coiffés et sont en bons. (...) L'étranger a piété du vieillard raide, de la vieille babouchka. (...) Voilà qu'on les maquille, qu'on les habille, qu'on les parfume, qu'on leur met entre les mains un cabloséleur, qu'on les branche sur LE MONDE !

Et que McDonald's leur remplisse l'estomac que ça vola leur soif ... d'exotisme ! (pp. 108-109)

1.2.3. La liberté

La liberté sillonne les pages de ce livre. C'est le mot le plus cher de Sonia, une jeune femme très volontaire. Pour elle, l'exil était le synonyme de la liberté, de la possibilité de penser, de s'exprimer librement : « C'est d'ailleurs pour ça que j'ai choisi le Canada comme terre d'asile » (p. 27), « Je pensais qu'ici on était libre de faire partie des organismes ou partis politiques » (p. 28) avoue sans hésiter Sonia. Être libre signifie parler une langue libre. Alors elle se pose même la question sur sa propre langue comme langue « (...) des pays conquis, soumis à la langue des colonisateurs comme le fut ma langue maternelle qui a vécu cinq cents ans en captivité, comment la langue s'exprime-t-elle une fois libérée ? » (p. 116).

Elle veut être libre comme individu qui appartient à un pays qui respecte les droits des hommes, de même femme qui vit dans une famille où chacun respecte l'autre. Elle veut vivre et aimer librement, c'est ainsi qu'elle a décidé de naître à la maison, comme un de femmes avant elle. Son choix, même désapprouvé par son mari, c'est son choix, elle-même sa décision de venir habiter le Canada, les temps du totalitarisme de la Bulgarie naissante. C'est un choix librement consenti de vivre selon ses propres règles. Elle n'est avec la deuxième enfant du couple, même si T. (son mari) n'est pas un mari modèle, la narratrice se rappelle son désir de « vivre » sa grossesse, son attachement pour que personne n'existe entre elle et son futur bébé (p. 111). Les préparatifs menés à bons termes, les livres lus, les amis invités, elle ne fait qu'attendre le grand événement : « Jamais je ne m'étais sentie si belle, aussi épanouie. Je me promenais dans la forêt et je me sentais aussi féconde que la terre (...) » (Ibidem). Elle attend l'attachement la définition même d'une naissance, de sa deuxième naissance, sur un sol autre que le sien ; c'est ainsi qu'elle devient libre dans le vrai sens du mot : « Je suis l'enfant qui vient au monde. Je suis la mère. La vie m'est donnée double » (p. 113).

Mais ses moments de détresse, sentimentale ou matérielle, la couvrent de leur rideau lourd. La liberté désirée ne lui a apporté que du malheur. Désorientée, elle cherche un refuge intermédiaire (pourquoi pas une autre variante de liberté?!), un refuge quasi onnel dans le « Lsd : Une fois. Voyage son et lumière à travers les lettres d'une affiche phosphorescente. Pas de limites de corps et d'espace. » (p. 65).

1.3. Difficultés culturelles

La culture est pour Sonia Anguelova, l'âme de chaque peuple. C'est dans la culture que chaque nation se reconnaît par ses habitudes, ses croyances, ses traditions. C'est toujours ici que chaque nation reconnaît l'autre, en parlant d'elle-même et s'ouvrant vers l'autre.

1.3.1. La culture bulgare

Parce à la recherche de la liberté et du devenir personnel, fuyant un régime totalitaire d'un ancien pays communiste, Sonia Anguelova reconnaît la culture de l'autre. Elle cherche à l'assimiler, dans les limites de son gros cœur, elle s'efforce, en même temps, de comprendre les nouveaux symboles, de respecter les autres et leurs traditions mais elle n'oublie pas l'harmonie de sa propre culture, les habitudes et les ressorts intimes de l'âme bulgare.

Balançant entre les siens et les autres, elle se rappelle avec nostalgie le son de l'accordéon et la chanson d'une jeune fille, fin de vacances dans « (...) un train bondé » dans la Bulgarie naissante :

Un train bondé. La fin des vacances. (...) On parle, on regarde défiler le paysage. Ça sent la sueur, le tabac. (...) Soudain, un son. Gai. Un son qui prend l'air, qui respire et en fait des mélodies. (...) Les yeux s'ouvrent et s'allument les sourires. Des yeux s'attachent à la porte du compartiment. Que les mains de la jeune fille sur le clavier sont habiles ! Et lui, il brille dans sa parure dorée. (p. 10).

La couleur d'un tissu devient pour elle une variante de vivre le rêve, de se sentir libre mais tournée vers le souvenir : « La broderie de la chemise nationale : « Qu'est-ce qui traverse les couleurs, les formes, les motifs et nous va droit au cœur dans un bout de tissu il y a des milliers d'années ? Est-ce le souffle d'une jeune fille, assise face à la forêt, un jour du mois de mai, qui brode sur la toile le soleil, les bourgeons et l'espoir de l'été à venir ? » (p. 23).

Ou la Mer Noire, la fameuse Tcherno moré (p. 30), est vue comme une mer intérieure, une mer qui lui apparaît « Cette mer intérieure qu'on essaie de calmer. Avec de la musique, de la nourriture, du thé. On invite les pêcheurs, on lance des filets. Nos rêves s'alimentent dans notre mer intérieure. » (p. 31)

Les icônes sont d'autres symboles chers à son âme : elles lui rappellent sans cesse qu'elle a quitté un pays mais, en même temps, une religion qui avait établi une relation étroite avec elle. Le regard de ces icônes est le seul qui compte pendant son exil voulu, d'ailleurs, et est le seul qui lui parle pendant ses moments de détresse. Elle regarde et se regarde dans le souvenir du miroir en « (...) l'icône de La Vierge Kataphygi et Jean le Théologien (...) du monastère de Poganovo » (p. 47) ou en étant un message sacré de l'âme en communion totale avec la divinité en essayant de faire valoir et de partager la richesse spirituelle de son peuple :

J'avais l'impression que les deux personnages étaient là pour moi, qu'une relation s'établissait entre eux et moi. (...) Tête-à-tête intime avec une icône. Dialogue à trois voix. Élévation de l'esprit, abandon du monde matériel, dépouillement, ascétique Invocation, au-delà des différents degrés d'évolution de chaque humain, au travail personnel de dépassement, pour le divin, le spirituel. (pp. 47-48)

Elle y ajoute les habitudes de la martenitza bulgare, fièvre nosalgique en même temps car le Danada n'a pas de tels bijoux qui parlent de l'âme d'un peuple :

Martenitza : Pour le bonheur que nous, Bulgares, arborons au mois de mars. Il est toujours fait avec de la soie rouge et blanche. Attaché par un cordon, ça peut être deux cœurs, deux pompons. On porte la martenitza à son poignet ou on la fixe à ses vêtements. Ma mère a toujours pris soin de nous envoyer des martenitzi, à moi, aux enfants et aux amis chers. J'ai gardé les plus belles, celles qui me rappellent mon enfance. (p. 73)

Le chocolat de la valise maternelle est un autre point d'appui qui parle du non-oubli du pays d'origine. La mère, fatiguée, venue de la Bulgarie natale, magicienne d'un temps non-vécu par les enfants d'un autre présent, de lui du Danada moderne, la mère dont créée le pont entre les deux civilisations et cultures :

Valise : Ma mère arrive dans ce village où le monde se connaît Elle arrive fatiguée morte. Verbe. L'arrivée de ma mère est un grand événement au village. Je m'en rends compte quand je vois le nombre d'enfants au seuil de la porte. (...) Ils s'assoient à distance et contemplant ma mère, son chapeau, sa valise énorme, ses airs d'ailleurs, comme si d'un moment à l'autre elle allait faire quelque tour de magie. (...)

1.3.2. La culture canadienne

Le nouveau pays d'adoption, lui aussi, impose ses propres marques culturelles. La recette à la rhubarbe apprise en Gaspésie (p. 94) est un intermédiaire culturel symbolique qui parle d'une pérennité des traditions dans un amalgame de nations, changeant avec ses habitudes et ses nostalgies.

Dans la vision de Sonia, le Canada a un « sport national » (p. 25) et déménager le monde change de domicile car, sur ce nouveau territoire, changer signifie se transformer, devenir quelqu'un autre qui est capable de continuer sa vie.

Les fêtes sont des occasions extraordinaires pour les Canadiens de se distraire, de socialiser et « Fêtes : Toutes les occasions sont bonnes. Les pleines lunes, la récolte du foin, les anniversaires. Et la Saint-Jean-Baptiste » (p. 37). Mais Sonia Anguelova, désireuse de comprendre l'autre, fait des comparaisons et de temps en temps, elle critique et « La première dans le pays d'accueil. La fête nationale (...). Qu'ont en commun « Au chant de l'alouette » – est-ce qu'il y en a, en ville, des alouettes ? – « La complainte du phoque » en Alaska – l'Alaska fait-il partie du Québec ? – et « Gens du pays » – le Québec n'est-il pas une des provinces du Canada ? » (Ibidem).

L'Autre, celui qui représente la nouvelle civilisation qui l'adopte, est pour la narratrice, celui qui entre en contact avec elle, même si l'on parle d'un Canadien ou d'un autre immigré. D'un côté, cette relation est marquée par la distinction immigrés/Canadiens, image extraordinairement surprise dans l'évolution de la fête nationale ; de l'autre côté, la fête nationale est paratouristisée, transposée dans la situation concrète de l'écrivaine, une immigrée qui parle d'un autre pays devenu le sien, un pays qui lui impose la langue, la culture, les mentalités. (L'immigrante, p. 56) et « Cette foule de trois mille personnes (...), cette foule où les couleurs vives des habits des immigrants se confondent avec les petits drapeaux bleu et blanc en papier qu'on leur a distribués, cette foule d'hommes noirs, blancs, asiatiques, des femmes, « hijabs », turbans et saris confondus, frappait des mains et essayait d'ajuster ses langues aux tournures et turlutes de la langue québécoise. » (p. 38)

Au moment même, elle est choquée par les habitudes que la vie lui impose et oublier la nature, se soumettre à la ville et « Ne parlez pas de nuages, on n'a plus le temps de les voir, de se laisser rêver. Pas de lyrisme ! Parlez le langage de la ville : entrecoupé, pressé, fébrile, instantané, souvent inutile. Ne parlez pas de ce qui dure : ni d'objets, ni de sentiments, ni de nous. Car nous vivons de marchandage, de profits. Faste ! Faste food, fast world, fast love. » (p. 79)

Mais ce nouveau pays, par la présence de ses îles, réinvente la vie simple des antécédents de quelqu'un autre monde, une variante possible de sa Bulgarie si chère et (...) La terre finit là où le ciel commence

La mer finit là où la terre commence
Le ciel finit là où la mer commence. (...)

au moment où la destinée lui parle. Elle cherche toujours une liaison entre deux pays, le pays natal et le pays d'adoption, des pays si différents comme langue, culture, mentalités, système politique et social ; elle remémore sans cesse les souvenirs du passé pour les superposer sur l'image du présent pour qu'ils deviennent plus réels que la réalité en elle-même.

Appartenant à deux cultures, Sonia Anguelova écrit dans la langue d'adoption qui est plus souple, plus fluide ; d'ailleurs c'est la langue de la liberté, de l'avenir ; elle n'oublie jamais l'autre, plus dure, plus imprégnée de passé et de souvenirs, une langue que les ancêtres de ses rêves parlent, une langue qui n'est pas vouée à l'oubli.

The mythology of the Nichita Stănescu's language. Invention and innovation

ABSTRACT

One of the most striking stylistic particularities Nichita Stănescu's poetry was apparent beginning with volume A Vision of Feelings and, finally, alongside the volume 11 Elegies.

It concerns the enormous capacity of Nichita Stănescu's discourse to assimilate in a poetic manner a considerable number of technical-scientific terms, the capacity to create a posture of enunciation, which is objective, detached, and impersonal. Because the scientific registry of N. Stănescu's poetry comprises complex aspects, which through their complexity surpass the limitations of the present chapter, the approach of only two core problems relevant to the redefining of his poetic originality is relevant.

KEYWORDS: Nichita Stănescu, poetic language, invention, innovation

Contextual extensions and combinations of valence

A first reading of Stănescian poetry produces discomfort. The reader is confused by the large quantity of specific terminology, terms, which are integrated in a very peculiar poetic context. A statistical pattern of operation is not necessary in order to ascertain the fact that Nichita Stănescu radically changes the composition of the Romanian poetic lexicon by extending relevant not only towards the popular, familiar and slang or jargon, as Tudor Arghezi has done before him, also allocating focus towards the areas of terminology specific to various sciences.

An inventory, without claiming completeness, reveals the existence of a large number of terms belonging to the field of anatomy (52 like words). A true "anatomical" could result from the summation of these terms, using largely self-designation or subjective representations of the anthropomorphized object universe.

Their analysis confirm the very accurate intuition of Nicolae Manolescu (1970: 3) regarding the lyrical corporeality of Nichita Stănescu:

His lyrics express corporeality in the sense that it utilizes a nomenclature as poetic metaphors. The eye, the eyebrows, the hands, the shoulders, the knees, the ribs, all to name a genuine language throughout his craft (...). No other poet has ever used the body largely. Never have the anatomical representations seen such organic lyricism.

Nichita Stănescu not only as a literary denomination inside the process of corporeal self-definition uses all this terminology, but it is also extracted inside a figurative space marked by a violent logic of lexical associations which are paradoxical and oxymoronic. On the one side, the bones, as parts of the human body, are given to narrating the romantic epithets (the black bone of the forehead, the bedding of light, visually (you, translucent bones, A Midwinter Night's Dream; the skeleton with livid bones. Harmonisation, moral, nervous sternum, Axios! Axios! The gentle bone that decorates the hand).

Music, on the other hand, sees terminology enter the composition of certain anthropomorphised metaphors based on the semantic transfer abstract to concrete, totally unusual within the Romanian poetic space: the skeleton of the moment dashing across eternity; the bone of the false idol of breath (The Idea of Mouth), winter liquefies its long white bones; the shiny bones of stars (Fire and Ice).

What is surprising here is not necessarily the uniqueness of one image or another, which can elicit the paradoxical associations of the surrealists, but rather the consistency of imagery transfers, which form a personal poetry that is fundamentally anthropocentric.

Thus, Stănescian poetry sees insistent invocations of blood with its properties transferred on to other referents (coagulated sadness – Song, history coagulates into solemn words – The Slit Man, continuous notions finding themselves in hyponymy, such as wound, lymph, plasma (sea of plasma, the greenish plasma of poplars), protoplasm alongside blood which is the dynamic sense of organic existence, Nichita Stănescu often mentions the brain, a times in shocking imagery, reminding us of Picasso's cubism (the blue brain, Harmonisation), and its constitutive and auxiliary elements: meninges, a term often used by Stănescu in the feminine gender: frail meninges, my sweaty meninges, my gentle meninges (The Buffon and Death).

The poet's anatomical drawing boards do not lack in terminology designating reproduction and generation, using them exclusively in metaphors associated with the object-universe: the gentle sex of flight (Fallstaff or the Evasion of the Myth), chimeras of the universe (To Invent a Flower).

Of all the organs of perception, the eye enjoys an almost exclusive allocation of attention with enormous attributes (the blue boulders of the eyes) described with great attention to anatomical details: the orbital cavity, the eyelids, the pupils; sometimes within an anthropomorphised metaphor: the green pupils of the grass.

Though it is not absent altogether, hearing is not as prominently reflected in the Stănescian terminology: the ear, its pavilions, the eardrum, less frequently invoked and usually within figurative contexts – harmonious eardrum (Of the Soul).

The richness of the anatomical terminology poetically exploited by Nichita Stănescu is without precedent in Romanian poetry. No other Romanian poet, except Ion Barbu in the field of Mathematics, has ever made such a coherent effort to substantiate a personal style using a specialised vocabulary.

This enterprise demonstrates that Nichita Stănescu abundantly possesses the imagination of concrete forms (as he characterises himself in the 7th Elegy, although he is an abstract poet in equal measure. The effect of using a nautical terminology is in fact intensely concrete, both in the achievement of bodily description of the lyrical self, as well as in the generation of anthropomorphised metaphors.

On the contrary, the metaphor is maintained, in as far as it relies on the element of surprise produced by the transfer of the word from one stylistic register to another (scientific-poetic), as is also confirmed by the images engraved on a specific zoological term: the cetacean air (Harmonisation).

The exact sciences are another great source of terminological selection for Nichita Stănescu's poetry, revealing the equal fascination of the poet for the rarefied area of concepts, paradoxically placed in the service of empirical abstractness.

Physics provides the terms sometimes used denotatively only for their lexical uniqueness: molecules, electrons, and velocity.

An enormous imaginative force animates the Stănescian poetic representations based on scientific notions. If the concepts borrowed from Physics usually produce abstract associations, the ones selected from the field of chemistry are meant to materialise the metaphorical merging or comparison, especially when they are based on names or elements of chemical substance or on characteristics belonging to them: space of chloride, lazy dances of ebony, with shades of phosphorus they shall strike you down (President Baudelaire).

Syntactic Innovations

A. Particularities of Constructing the Direct Object

One of the most striking syntactic deviations of Stănescian poetry which establishes itself through insistent current tendencies of changing the syntactic status of intransitive verbs.

The systematic transitivity of certain verbs which do not know this syntactic use within the common language has drawn the attention of Nichita Stănescu scholars from an early stage, linguists and non-linguists alike, who were content to note the presence of the phenomenon, without adding further comments as to the poet's justification behind this deviation widely represented in the poet's works starting with the volume A Vision of Feelings and ending with his posthumous works.

The verbs which are forcefully transited by breaking a syntactic rule of subcategorisation (the impossibility of the intransitive verbs to combine with a direct object) are grouped according to the analysis made in three distinct syntactico-semantic situations.

a) The first is represented by the one in which the transitive action, performed by the human agent placed in the position of the grammatical subject falls upon an inanimate phenomena. This layout of syntactic displacement of the logical-semantic roles is specific mainly to the poet's early poetry, especially his first three volumes (due to the connection between the categories as syntactic functions and as specific categories/logical-semantic roles) (Pană Dindelegan, 1972 : 23).

The relationship between the describer-character and the object-universe is directed by the imaginary pattern of cosmic expansion as it relates to the human subject, transforming the world in a Jordanic way which is didactic or fantasy. The linguistic reflex of this unidirectional orientation from the human agent towards the surrounding universe consists of the presence of a great number of transitive verbs, many of them originating from forceful transitivity (either by breaking a restriction that is purely syntactically combined with the direct object as is the case of the following verbs: to rise, to silence; or belonging to a semantic restriction as is the case with the verbs: to hiss, to hurt, whose transitivity is severely limited by context).

I hiss at the moon and I rise and I change in to a big love.

(Emotion of Autumn)

(...) the tendons of strained light sounding as the wave freshly risen from the sea, which time, by swimming, silences and hurts them.

(Song)

This type of constructions decreases substantially after the volume The Right to Time, as the centrifugal emotions of the lyrical self, of ruling the moon through imagination are diminished alongside the robust drive and serenity of the juvenile period.

In his later poetry several such constructions continue to occur, presenting core verbs which lead towards a different semantic direction.

One of these is the verb to be, whose transitivity allows the lyrical subject to declare its poeti-dentification with all the possible forms of existence – paraphrasing the famous Rimbaudian formula “Je es-tun autre”:

(...) I am the equal of all this, // from fish to bird, // from grass to apricot, // from goat to rabbi. All of this I am each passing moment.

(Metamorphoses)

In his posthumous works, one frequently encounters the transitive verb to silence betraying the obsession of approaching a territory beyond language, a territory of the non-word, a non-obsession reminding us of Mallarmé's A Silent White Poem, Rilke's Mistrusting the Word, and Silent Word.

I made in the morning room the flying vulture and sang to him in silence with sweet remembrance

(At the Vulture)

I beg of you, let us silence nature! // Let us silence all that exists.

I would say if only I could say what needs to be said / I would be silent if I could be silent silence. Silence / I am Streamer

(The Crushing)

b) The second situation is represented by the placement in the position of the direct object of the reflexive pronoun corresponding to the subjective persona, a syntactic position directed by a verb, which has suffered a forced transition.

This construction becomes an expression of the processes taking place within the inner space of lyrical subjectivity, a space whose limits are perceived as oppressive.

⊕ A disintegrated situation where transitive verbs are attracted through force to the one in which the human persona is distributed into the position of the direct object appearing from a logical-semantic point of view to be the patient of an action performed by a non-human agent (shadow, death, vulture, nature, lover, water, angel, God), including a physical or spiritual sub-structure of the subjective persona (the eye, the feeling).

From a syntactic standpoint this situation and the one discussed above, presents analogies to the so-called periphrastic passive constructions, in which case we encounter an intransitive and non-agentive base construction. Eg: The eye DOES I die => "my eye hurts". (Himself)

The poetic relevance of this syntactic transformation consists of the specifically modern mutation of vision proposed upon the lyrical subject: it loses the poignancy of emotions and the imaginative omnipotence of its own romantic period, he lives no more, but lets himself be experienced, he no longer controls the object universe, becoming its prisoner including his own perishing corporeality.

The examples, countless in all the stages of Nichita Stănescu's works, but mostly in his later poetry, Epica Magna, Imperfect Works, Anti-metaphysics are relevant in this respect (...) with every shadow (...) my soul lessens.

(Enghidu)

[She] gently uncombed her blonde hair / numbing me with death.

(A Change of Heart)

(...) my long mane saunter over the sands.

(Desert)

Another aspect of constructing the direct object in Nichita Stănescu's poetry, utterly unnoticed by critics, consists in:

- the extension of the morpheme "on" from the personal direct object (characterised through semantic features individualised on a human level utilising the direct non-personal version of the nominal object, non-individualised and even none-defined (for the construction of the direct object in Romanian) (Pană Dindelegan, 1976: 279).

In his poetry, Nichita Stănescu commonly deals with:

- Inanimate objects as personalised and individualised presences, which is reflected in the method of construction of the position of the direct object. The construction appears in the volume The Right to Time, but it is used and intensified in the poet's later works:

A game of passing, faster, slower, / for my eye and myself creating the trees (...)
(Enghidu)

Why did you make the tree / was it / humiliate (...)?
(Why?)

(...) give me, mother, out of solitude only / number seven (...)
(The Plowing)

If, in the case of inanimate nouns, the aforementioned construction works as a discrete form of personification, in the absence of the actual canonical figure,

- in the case of those animate but non-human, the same construction has an individualisation role:

Let's go, I say, without mercy, let us hunt the stag in stag (...)
(The Arrowing of the Stretin Stag and Harpooning of the Otter Fish)

(...) and you shall see with your own eyes (...) / the black goats of the cliff drowning.
(My Daemon towards me)

A surprising construction is that through which Nichita Stănescu personalises and individualises indefinite and negative pronouns placed in the position of the direct object (with the help of the morpheme "on" and even that of the clitic doubling), although there is a semantic incompatibility in the Romanian language between non-defining and the "on" constructions, between defining and doubling.

The above-mentioned phenomenon must be put in connection with the conversion of the indefinite and negative pronouns into nouns, both being methods of representation of the empty day, of an invoked in the poetry of Nichita Stănescu.

B. The extension of the combinatory valences of certain words

In this sense, the main Stănescu's innovation consists of the extension of the possibilities of the main verbs (verbal expressions) and adjectives to use let's prepositional objects. The most widely represented ones are the prepositional objects preceded by the preposition "by":

This is how we go blind/deaf and crippled by a simple word.
(You're not going to come)

Or by the relaxation of a semantic restriction based on a selection of the respective objects

(1) Oh, wide-awakeness, impregnated by the objects of the world.
(Cosmogony or Lullaby)

(2) No even sadness can make me beautiful! (...) no even the street emptied by your absence.
(Song)

(3) Only a moment (...) let me be separated from you.
(Only a Moment)

(4) The horse had been calmed by the saddle/ and the mountain had been calmed by the vultures.
(Through the Orange Tunnel)

Consequently, the aforementioned syntactic deviations trigger a reformulation of semantic structures related to regular words. Therefore, impregnated (1) becomes the expression of a pregnant fullness, naked (2) actualizes the values of the adjectives desolate and solitary, alone (3) gains the connotations of being official isolation, a saviour of individuality (the verse is an exhortation addressed to death).

Other prepositional objects, fewer in number in Stănescu's poetry are built with the preposition "why"?

Why does the walker walk? / Why does the mover move? / Why do the tremblers tremble? / Why does he who has seen character (...).
(Sibylline Books)

C. The Contextual Extension of an Adjectival Construction

The poet has a true affinity for this type of construction which is strongly marked by a fiction, be showing innovation towards the amplification of the afforded adjectival registry currently admitted in this position.

The syntactic deviations achieved through semantic risks, a household specialty of Nichita Stănescu's style, are more numerous than the deviations from the rules of strict sub-categorisation (the creation of new syntactic valences).

The poet loosens the semantic restrictions dealing with the combination of poetic terms, generating paradoxical associations of imagery surprising metaphorical connotations and even syllogisms.

Overwhelmingly, these innovative constructions are the expression of different states of mind, emotions and actions of the subjective self, which would explain the capricious logic of the imagery at hand. In the construction inventory, an already existing syntactic pattern is indicated with respect to the poet's decision to undertake a certain semantic freedom?

Constructions with the verb TO GET:

I am getting + adverb (sick, hot)

Oh, I was getting far (...)

(Woman)

I am getting + nominalive noun (sleepy, thirsty, hungry, homesick). The preposition “for” – conjunctive sentence

I am getting homesick for my village/leave

I am getting (...) death for the sublime.

(The Quiet after the Myth)

Constructions with the verb TO BE:

I am + adverb (well, easy, hard, lonely)

I'm no longer feeling beautiful/ I'm feeling lonely.

(Calling)

Constructions with the verb TO GET:

I am getting + nominalive noun (sick, weak, dizzy)

I was getting sweet/ death.

(Incantation)

The verb TO GIVE + supine (to drink, to suspect, to work), in the example extracted from Stănescu's poetry, we are dealing with the loosening of a selective restriction and not the invention of a supine for the verb to die, as is the opinion of Ecaterina Mihăilă, 1985: 34-35), a form existing in the language (“It's hard to die young”, “It's easy to live, to die is harder”)

Oh mother, give me and my friends something to drink/ and after our thirst for life has been quenched/ give us, oh mother, something to die for.

(To hand-feed me)

Firstly by introducing semantic deviations inside syntactic patterns pre-existing in another language, these constructions constitute powerful elements of stylistic surprise, based on the readers' frustrated horizon of expectation.

Secondly, they overwhelmingly transport narrations referring to the perceptions, sensations, the physiological needs, the inner emotions of the subjective person, proposing therefore an intensely subjective vision based on the relationship between the human being and the object-universe.

The contextual semantic incompatibilities introduced by the poet are first of all Concerned with the original representation done through unconventional means of the use of Romanian poetry in general, of the fundamental movement of association generated by the lyrical self in connection with the surrounding Cosmos. The preferred semantic infractions perpetrated by the enunciating subject consisted of:

- the replacement of a concrete noun instead of an abstract one: "I'm getting grass, goat, autumn, Noah". "I got poplar, kernel, pit, angel, priest, pyramids, Einstein".

One is compelled to notice the grouping of these concrete nouns, often in long enumerative series, expressing the aspiration to identify the lyrical self with an entire array of forms of existence.

- the association of words providing a contradiction of terms: "I am getting death from the sublime", "it's getting late early".

- the substitution of nouns, which designate corporal possession, perceptions, sensations, physiological states, the inner emotions of the human subject with nouns, concrete in general referring to external references belonging to a respective noun: "I'm making leaves, I'm making horses", "I'm gold, glass, earth, vultures, water, mountain etc", "my devil hurts, the verb, copper, milkweed, the dog, the rabbit, the stag, the tree, the board, the setting, etc.", "the streets hurt", "I'm cold from words", "my trees and my birds are numb", "I am sick with song, windows, number one ...".

These substitutions, which are quite numerous, provide, perhaps, the most comprehensive imagery of the expanding body projected by the imagines subject inside the poem, using identification with all the elements of the surrounding Cosmos.

The replacement of the modal adverbs, used in verbal expressions (containing personal pronoun in the dative case) through adverbs of place or time: "I was getting far", "I was getting late early". This way, the states of mind, the emotions of the human subject are no longer just qualified ("it's hard/easy for me to..."), but portrayed, becoming sentimentally of "the far", a feeling of the existential lackness.

All of the semantic-syntactic deviations entail, in fact, a radically different way of implementing metaphorical significance. The difference between the canonical metaphor patterns such as: "My beloved is autumn sky, clear and pink" (Baudelaire) and "I'm getting autumn" (Nichita Stănescu) consists in the logical condensation of the process through which the metaphorical poles are related (the subjective feeling and the invoked season). Differently though, the difference resides in the fact that poetic significance is achieved not only through an innovative semantic association, but also through the semantic infringement of a syntactic rule.

D. Stages of Discourse Syntactical Deconstruction

The displacement of natural word order in a sentence represents an old characteristic of the poetic language, a trademark of what Nichita Stănescu called syntactic poetry.

Traditional cases of topical turbulence represented by syntactic inversions and various dislocations in Stănescian poetry were analysed by Ecaterina Mihăilă (1985: 43), who noted, and rightly so, that it was characteristic for Nichita Stănescu to practice a procedure, refining it to the point of exhaustion, in one and the same poem or even in multiple poems written in the same period.

One must know the early on that he does not set in these classic derangements regarding the order of poetic enunciation. Most examples of syntactic inversion quoted by Ecaterina Mihăilă belong to the early poetry of Nichita Stănescu, when the poet was still partially devoted to a traditionalist poetic diction:

On their stripe, the arrow of the body went upwards /
Lensing each and every age.
(Upward Movement)

If I should turn back one thought /
I shall find that there is nothing left behind me /
Of this I testify on my knees /
I utter no words for any ear.

(Andru Weeping)

Along with the displacements of the direct objects illustrated above, the author also notes the forward movements of the adjectival determinants, more specifically where they are combined with any dislocations of elements placed between the adjective and its regent:

(...) I burn myself in the depth of my eyes / lights I have never before touched...
(Enghidu)

The topical dislocations are also selected, from Nichita Stănescu's early poetry, when this procedure as well as the one before it, act as a partial filter of ambiguity of the poetic enunciation and not as a form of expressive disarticulation:

(...) like a gaze thrust forward / through the ether of hot [memories].
(Song about the Youth of the Hero)

Abnormal Syntactic Connections

A striking particularly relevant to the formulation of the connections based on the copulative coordination in the poetry of Nichita Stănescu: the elements associated through coordination present either a high degree of semantic incompatibility, or as the procedure becomes increasingly more daring, they belong to different grammatical classes, obtaining unforeseen effects of understanding.

The coordination of two adjectives can bear stylistic relevance if

- (1) they belong to incompatible semantic spheres and if,
 (2) they are, in addition, dislocated by the presence of the regent/nominal?

(1) Dear, long and Christian ceremonies (...)

(Without Baptism)

(2) (...) unveiling the same old blue [iris] and orange.

(The Invisible Sun)

The final stage in the process of language deconstruction in Stănescu's poetry is represented by the development of a personal technique of stripping a way the semantics of the word through a sui-generis discursive mechanism. This is nothing more than the negative penance of the operations through which poetry in its constructive effort generated the super-sign or the lyrical hyper-sign.

The syntactic resorts of this regression towards the null sign (non-word) are of great interest.

An ice station on a field of ice/ with icy rails/ with a rain of ice./ Then/ two ice stations/ on two fields of ice/ on two sets of icy rails/ with two rains of ice./ Then/ three of ice/ with three of ice/ and three of ice./ Then, ice of ice/ with ice of ice/ with a station of ice/ with two rains of ice/ with then of then/ with then of ice.

(The Station)

The main syntactical in fraction of his lex consists of the hallucinatory proliferation of the same pattern of construction, inside of a discourse which seems to be infinitely analysed. The total suppression of predication, illusively substituted by the repetition of narrative adverbs, brings into attention the massive clustering of nominal groups, offering the lex a densely descriptive character.

In the beginning, the description keeps a systematic aspect, using enumeration to specify the components of the tableau (station, field, rails). These proliferate in a hallucinatory manner but in accordance with a mechanical logic, revealing the predilection of Stănescu's visionary descriptions for the contemplation of uniformed multiplicity.

If in the beginning the stereotypical determinants of names still have a referential, non-denotative function (station, field, icy rails); in the second part of the lex they are put in the service of the process of semantic displacement, through the generation of absurd combinations (the tautology ice of ice) or syntactically impossible combinations (the determinants of the rain and ice/ words without notional content then of ice) in the utterance then of then, the regent as well as the determinants have become null words. This lex is singular in the illustration of discursive mechanisms disseminated by the poet of the Unwords.

If in the poem The Station, Nichita Stănescu exploits the function of repetition and stereotypical determination, amplifying everything to the point of nonsense, in Goodnight, he achieves similar results performing a negative description of the poetic object, not through the accumulation of attributes, but through consecutive elimination of those respective attributes.

The end-point of this act of negation is the condescending of language itself which along with the elimination of the referent has lost its reason for being:

Why do you have no hands? The Unaddressed one asked me. - Because my rabbit was stolen from my arms and my arms along with it. - Why was the rabbit stolen from your arms? The rabbit from your arms? he asked me when I had no arms, but blood instead of arms. The one who asked the question asked me. - Because they stole the rabbit for running. That's, (...) that's why I was left without a rabbit because he was left without running, which they were from his baby rabbit body. - What running? What running? - The one from the green grass which was left without roots. - What root? What root? - The ones that were left without soil. - Which soil? - The one that was left without a sun and it is left black, black, black, in the light of my eyes, which I no longer have. - What have you lost that makes you speak? What have you lost that makes you speak? Don't you think that far too many beings spin around with nothingness, around an orb? I turned and asked, I'm not saying what. That's my business. Apart from this, I advise and guide you, don't you dare use your tongue in this manner, expect for silence. This way, children, a horn tongue doesn't speak, it bleeds. Goodnight!

(Goodnight, Imperfect Works)

Nichita Stănescu's process of reformulating speech does not appear in its entirety. What is the author of Unwords apart from other postwar authors is the very coherent and systemic character of the subversions performed by him inside and even against the system of the language.

It is not the variety of types of deviations that is of interest to the poet, but rather the consistent implementation of some personal rules specific to his poetic system, making his poetic style always recognizable. It is not the great number of suffixes and prefixes enlisted in the poetic derivations that bestows relevance to the originality of the lexical creations obtained (especially with the negative and the depriving prefixes) but their vast contextualisation.

It is not the exhaustion of formal patterns of lexical creation that subsannates the object of Stănescu's reform, nor is it the experimentation of the list of possible conversions in the Romanian language. Similarly, the problem can be raised for all morphological and syntactical departments, inside which the poet focuses his offensive targeting several precise targets (the extension of the category of comparison, the personalisation and reflexivity of certain verbs, the poetic reformulation of the particularities of construction regarding the direct object, the loosening of restrictions which deal with syntactical and semantic word combinations).

The systematic of the deviations proposed only through an exhaustive research of the poetic work of Nichita Stănescu clearly demonstrates that we are not dealing with minor trifling experiments, but rather with a comprehensive poetic project in the service of which the poet places an extraordinary sense of language (the polyglossia of the Romanian language, as the poet liked to joke about) and a robust verbal energy.

One factor or another, regarded separately, may appear as minor exercises, ludic improvisations made on the canvas of the language. Integrated though, in the organized ensemble of his work, like the rocks of a mosaic, they participate in the configuration of a unique linguistic experience within the postwar Romanian poetic space.

It is very surprising the fact that Nichita Stănescu explored all of the departments of the language simultaneously, in order to give the full measure of his poetic resourcefulness. Not completely content with language, questioning its structural limits and the arbitrary nature of its signs, the poet was, at the same time, unsatisfied with “the phonetic, morphologic and syntactic poetry” (The Physiology of Poetry), dreaming of what he called a “metalinguistic poetry”:

I feel, as natural logic, the tendency of poetry to become metalinguistic, above the material world of language, redeeming itself to no end. Great poetry has indeed never resided inside metaphors or ideas, it has sought for itself an autonomous area, all of itself, a self-fundamental dimension of the human spirit, a killing human language as a vehicle and nothing more, a vehicle transporting exactly all that is characteristic and particular to humanity, differentiating it from all that is, something different from humanity, situated in and within a negation of the rotten, rotten, smothering meaning and purpose to the existential phenomenon.

Somewhat improper, because it refers to the idea of “meta-poetry”, of “poetry of poetry”, the term metalinguistic employed by Nichita Stănescu is “read” by us as trans-linguistic, because the latter properly justifies the “transgressive” direction of Stănescian poetry, of its major objective to go “beyond” the limitations of the given linguistic system.

In this respect, we note that the “poetics of the unword” (a metaphorical denomination for the propensity of poetry towards that “autonomous area”, desired by the poet) must be perceived as a bivalent reformative action, to be destructive and to be constructive at the same time.

On the one side, poetry goes beyond the word (the simple sign with its semantic established through the use of the common language) towards the super-sign or the hyper-sign, activating in this respect, lexical, morphologic and syntactic mechanisms (lexically composed, ad hoc agglutinations of unusual, derived signs, fictitious words, words made up through conversion, personalised verbs which are non-lexically afforded new meaning, syntactic “galaxies” of words etc.).

On the other hand, poetry descends under the limitation of the word towards the null sign or the unword, placed inside the discourse through an array of no less ingenious procedures (derivations with privative and negative prefixes, ludic separations, awkward conversions, fictitious deprived of any structural remnants linked to the morphological system, operating with single-plane signs such as the phoneme/letter, with lexemes with no conceptual content such as onomatopoeias, deconstruction of meaning using techniques based on disruptive mechanisms).

A vast material offered in this direction is the analysis of the lexical, morphological and syntactic deviations themselves, a sunlit common source of metaphorical significance (E.g. creations derived with metaphorical meaning such as stagger body, to grass, the reaction of the oppositional metaphorical epithet through paradoxical composition - word, child, kings, animals, emperor heart etc., the metaphorical meaning of personalised impersonal verbs - to snow, to rain, to blow, the of forced transitivity - "my eye is killing me", or the of the loosening of semantic restrictions based on the combination of words: "I'm being made to pour", "I'm being made to die for the sublime").

The establishment of a poetic use of the un-word, which is exclusively transgressive, appears to be the final step achieved by the lyrical subjectivity in its attempt to extend its dominion over the material of language.

After the poet voice has time after time experienced different methods of textual organisation and various stylistic registers, after it has attended games of perspective and games of language, it proposes its own linguistic utopia – a poetic language marked by incidents and specific deviations, which insulate and overthrow the signs, challenging their semiotic potential, and at the same time denouncing its fragile conventionality.

It is quite certain that the poet has played in total contention a great deal of the conventions with which, until him, were directing the construction of the lyrical discourse, violently renegotiating his to negotiate with the reader. He played into contention the very purpose of the words as support for the act of communication. In its act of negation, it hides a non-optimistic paradox of ascending into the meaningless layers of vocabulary, the poet does not abdicate from his status of semiotic animal. He continues to utter words in order to create super-signs, live his utopia until the very end, His story of despair is one of victory as well: "The word is dead! Long live the Word!"

Technical and Mathematical – Hermeneutic Symbols

Mathematical terminology is present as well in the poetry of Nichita Stănescu, without the poet continuing a long trajectory initiated by Ion Barbu. The mathematical terms are not used in Stănescu's poetry as hermetic symbols and are not integrated inside an elliptical syntax, to create, an additional filter for the isolation of the lyrical act as was the case with his predecessors.

Nichita Stănescu utilises mathematical terminology as well as physical and chemical terminologies, for the games of stylistic to create enables.

The best represented terminology is the one he borrowed from geometry, starting with the name of the discipline, applied in the description of the subjective person's interior self ("it had burnt like napalm the geometry of the heart, known/ by me and me alone", Self-Portrait in the Fourth Dimension), and continuing with the numbers of the geometrical figures or the category adjectives corresponding to them, utilised either as symbols of ideal perfection, surreal, or as an expression of emotions, a point defined in the axiomatic manner of Euclid.

However, what radically sets him apart from Ion Barbu, with whom he was often superficially associated, is the fact that his terminology is not popular work for the construction of an ideal geometry of existence, of pure prototypes, deriving from Platonism, but, on the other hand, it consistently serves the representation of the human subject both materially and spiritually.

The drawing of his fate is associated with either the rhomb or the oval, or even the triangle, while the positive states of mind are upwardly veered (vertical red), and the negative ones, marked by sometimes irreducible limitations are associated to geometric bodies, enclosed spaces in general (the sphere, the cube, the cylinder, curved, convex and concave surfaces), within an anti-Barbian symbolic shape.

In the poems he explicitly associated with geometric forms, such as Euclid's Quarrel, The Choosing of the Sphere, Lesson about the Cube and Lesson about the Circle, the poet early distances himself from a geometric perspective, purged by the real in the context of existence.

His gestures are symbolic – the rejection of the sphere, based on the justification that it is not beautiful, the shattering of a corner of a cube, the cutting of the circle – are all equivalent with the option of embracing what is real, with the acceptance of imperfection as inherent to all concrete forms, including art work.

Nichita Stănescu reintegrates numbers in their concreteness, cancelling all of the basic operations utilising numbers. The expression of this poet's vision can be found in two ludic texts, where the numbers are used in a bundant like in a children's game, providing only a pretext in a plea for accepting the unique and unrepeatable nature of concrete forms:

One plus one equals two, / one plus one equals three / or four or five ... / (...) This count is a dream, a slogan. / a hard 2 is not the same as a soft 2 / a long 2 is not the same as a short 2 / and this is because / it's all the same / so two equals one / (one is the wife of 1) / 1 in the vocative / is not the same as 1 / in the imperative!

(Poetic Mathematics)

We know that one times one equals one, / but a unicorn times a pear / we don't know the result / (...) Oh, but a blank multiplied by a rabbit / equals a redhead woman, of course, / a cabbage divided by a flag / equals a pig, / a horse without a ram / equals an angel, / a cauliflower plus an egg / equals aalus...

(Another kind of Mathematics)

Beyond these ludic exercises, the numbers return relatively frequently in the poetry of Nichita Stănescu, the poet showing a genuine obsession of origin, translated through the cultivation of symbols, such as the number 1: “I'm sick of the number one” (Axios! Axios!)

Another field of terminology poetically harnessed by Nichita Stănescu belongs to the technical field. Without displaying vast wealth, this terminology, also activated at the same time by futuristic poetry, is able to characteristically create images. The poet builds metaphors through the transfer of properties belonging to technical objects onto natural elements or the human body.

Therefore, he talks about “the great sprockets of seasons” (The Right to Time II), “the black cliché of the lake” (Autumn Dawn), about the nights “as propellers” (At the Beginning of the Nights). The words are compared to “electric trains” or “race cars” (Ars Poetica), and their force of penetration generates an unusual association, substantiated in the metaphor “linguistic laser” (Unwords). Even the character-self can be described with a distreke sense of humour “as wise and with spare parts” (Loss of conscience through knowledge) or as seeing itself make an incursion into the structure of matter, a “raid” inside the stones.

The tension of the inner emotions is released through the explosion of corporeal structures, a striking metaphor of the interior disharmony of modern man “exploded heart”, “It usually exploded like a temple”, (Defeated Anti-matters), or explodes within in Bengalese fires “the unseen part of my self/ being illuminated by Bengalese fires” (Bird Passing through a Cloud)

In general, when it comes to Nichita Stănescu, the use of scientific terminology is tributary to oxymoronic logic.

The most unexpected associations between objects, phenomena, reigns, or orders of imagery (abstract/concrete) fall in suspension in his poetry with a astonishing felicity. The registry aims at suggesting a paradoxical logic of imagery placed in the distreke and, eliciting incredible flexibility on the part of the reader.

Another example, chosen at random from the thousands of paradoxical imagistic combinations of Nichita Stănescu, demonstrates the same rapid change aim, reuniting in one single verse two zoomorphic representations of the object universe: “Nails of leaves scratched the cetacean air” (Harmonisation)

The Violent Negotiation of the Contract with the Reader. Stylistic Registries of the Stănescian lyrical voice

The attempt to take back the spirit of the old language, though the introduction in the lexicon of some archaic linguistic samples, is a relatively late enterprise of the Stănescian body of work.

The samples can be dated, mostly, from the period after the volume In Sweet Classical Style and exposes a refined pleasure of the cultural game. Nichita Stănescu was a fervent reader of the old chronicle texts and old authors in general, as it is evident from his reading notes published in volumes or in the written press, or from some of his original parodies created in accordance with the chosen literary models.

Practising within area or another, reconstituting the semantic load of certain archaic words, the colouring of some grammatical forms or some out-of-use syntactic constructions, the poet undertakes suggestive exercises of virtuosity acting like a child, as did Arghezi in “the poem of the old hag and the crumb”, thoroughly enjoying in an aesthetic manner the pleasure of being an accomplice to the obsolete eras of Romanian poetry. Daniel Dinițiu signalled a few such words and archaic constructions in the poetry of Nichita Stănescu, stating that they are sometimes justified extra-linguistically, by the need to evoke the spirit of an époque, but that it almost always materialises the poet's struggle to bring himself closer to “the primary stages of the language, its naïve and incredibly prolific age, the age when the word would undertake a huge effort in order to capture meaning and stabilise its form.” (Dimărieu, 1997: 285)

The updating of the archaic registry is symptomatic of the poet's ludic intentions (not necessarily a need for parody), one such stylistic exercise has neither the reach nor the seriousness with which the Romanians looked back towards the past and its naïve poetry, regressing towards the mythical age of language (the analysis of Eminescu's archaic poetic layer of language is interpreted by Mihaela Mancaş, 1991: 40): “(...) was answered to the soldier.” (The Discharge), “(...) An idea was taken from my mind.” (Transfiguration)

One can easily observe that, in general, archaic forms are used in the singular, as colourful elements of contrast in comparison with the broader stylistic context of poetry. There are few existing examples which underline another element which doubles the baseline archaic construction, such as the ancient form of the preposition “gre” or a verb with a changed conjugation: it is recalled (in selected the present tense suffix of the 1st conjugation). The archaic forms of nouns appear additionally, without having any relevant frequencies.

In Sweet My Leather Chalice, they are reported by the resurrection of the gallant obsolete tonality of the troubadour poetry, with all the common places of the court rhetoric of obedience and devotion:

Drink from my leather chalice / Madam, we have only hard wines. / (...) I am a carpe underneath your feet and a ring on your hands, / my sash is your earring.

(Sweet My Leather Chalice)

The lexical or phonetic archaisms experience limited use from the poet. They generally appear harmonised in context or placed in the service of the parenthetical style, or even the creation of an Eminescian sound structure:

You shall also see, when you begin to love, she who will be your wife.

(Someone's Teachings to his Son)

Let her fly with my forsaken thought and forever spreading roots / just like the warhead would grant voice to the walls of cities.

(Not even an autumn)

The simple negation, a construction used between the 16th and 18th century, becoming archaic only in the second half of the next century, is used as a powerful stylistic effect employed on a syntactic level. (Gheție, 1978: 177)

It is confirmed that the use of negative pronouns in the formulation of simple negation has the effect of turning those respective pronouns into nouns, making empty change a character in itself. Nichita Stănescu utilises the simple negation in other contexts, surely aiming at creating an element of stylistic surprise:

I therefore desist on my knees of these, / words that do not deserve the lifting of my ear.

(Andru Weeping)

inside you can not see, / green leaf, very green leaf, / nor can you feel or smell / as the silky silk.

(Cantos)

There are few Stănescian texts that assemble a homogenous archaic stylistic formula. Far from being a religious poet, Nichita Stănescu does structure some of his poems based on the model of prayer (Prayer, Humble Prayer), without transferring them the specific nuances of a text from that era.

Only in The Gospels of Autumn does the lyrical voice re-sequente the tonality of old religious texts, insistently repeating verbs in the future with the auxiliaries or by optically inverting the predicate and the subject/direct object, two syntactic features which were mostly characteristic to the language of our first religious texts from the 16th century.

In our Gospels we shall write about the fall of the autumn leaves. / Matthew will say / -The green leaf of the green shall fall in the autumn. / Mark will shout / -From the burden of life because of life, on life shall the autumn leaves fall

(The Gospels of Autumn)

The text is based on the repetition within multiple variants of the same logical sentence (Leaves Fall in the Autumn), but the lack of imagery is substituted through the careful staging of the discursive situation.

The Gospels, as alternative stories, focused on the same referent, are taken as an expository model of this poem, so that the polyphony of lyrical "voices" may prophetically support (through a generalised future), the vision of a twilight world in full dismemberment.

Someone's Teachings to his Son, is officially declared a palimpsest text. I re-enact the model of Byzantine parental literature of The Teachings of Neagoe Basarab to His Son Teodosie, practicing a very modern type of intertextuality compared to the imaginary translation from the sonnets of Vasile Voiculescu, and, in general, with an entirely modern and postmodern practice of grafted textualization on a pre-existent literary structure.

What is ultimately solidified is not, of course, the ideal substance of the original, but only the stylistic layer of discursive organization. The wise one, the direct and affectionate (my dear), the rigorous assembly of this corpus of wisdom and morality in paragraphs (I through XI), the solemn expression ("all that exists possesses a celebration of its own", "the most miraculous fact of existence is the fact that it is", "the male shines beautifully in his incapacity to give birth"), the rhetorical accumulation of conditionals, no less than twelve in the 4th part of the poem, the emphatic repetitions ("And all that/ exists is nearly left without space by that which/ exists where they want to celebrate the self"), and all these elements combine to create the appearance of a moralising discourse of the era, even in the actual absence of grammatical and lexical archaisms, discreetly marked in the text ("wife", "guess", "place", the dative which uses "esse" – "that which is/ pleasant to the eye can replace a shirt").

Spatial limitations do not compel the reading of a single sample?

Don't be in a hurry to run. / Stay put / even the core of the iron pours lazily inside the iron. / look at the iron and be like it // and now, my dear, I'm going to catch you / what you must do / when you will no longer be able to be. / Wash yourself and I can yourself! / The Phoenix doesn't like / far castles and dirt

(Someone's Teachings to his Son)

In fact, Nichita Stănescu shies away from this temptation, though proving himself to be a passionate commentator of Romanian literary folklore texts.

The folklore texts are few and far between in his works and are mostly ludic. The poet appears to only desire to give his pen a try in this register, allowing his fellow writer from the same generation, Ion Gheorghe, the vast constructions, the resizing of indigenous mythology, the fantastic surreal folklore.

What surprises is the emergence of lines which are folkloric in the appearance in one of his volumes, Laus Ptolemaei, dominated by an exhibit which is scientific, learned, cold, and impersonal. Nevertheless, the poet appears to relish the sudden shifts in stylistic register, the transition in formulas, the collages assembling the most paradoxical of styles.

Therefore, part of Song for Taking out the Water from the Ear oscillates in tonality between the song of estrangement (of longing and weeping) and the worldly song, with echoes from the Văcărești and Conachi poets:

Damn you trees, to be / white and pain / on the flake of feather / torn / from the clouds with drained face. / (...) / Cause I'd rather die / than long for something / and I's rather perish / than see my words as heavy iron / as they try to ascend towards the skies, / the words with the body of air / the letter with the laughter of air ... / Only the heaviness is heavy / only the wheel keeps spinning / yesterday and the day before ... /
Oh Soul, you'd be better off dead.

(Song for Taking out the Water from the Ear)

The impression grafted onto the verbal repetition (“Damn you trees, to be”), the anaphoric structures (“I'd rather”, “the words”, “only”), the etymological definition (“the heaviness is heavy”) which has the purpose of intensifying, the symmetry of modals (“than see”, a component of crossed anaphors), the rhyming pattern, are the elements characteristic to the folkloric lyrical song which the poet uses as support to make his painful essential (the trees are “white”, the clouds have a “drained face”, “the cold falls into the cluster bean”)

Another text, Oh Tree, Oh Tree, a song or another way to say it, as a fast large on plants, centered upon the lyrical folkloric motif of the tree as a double vegetable of man, reconstitutes not only the stylistic matrix of the folkloric text, but also uses in crucially to bring forth a similar Bălgian poem, Oh Black Cherry Tree, resorting itself from the processing of the folkloric model.

Another compositional parallel forged on the reciprocity between the animal and vegetal kingdoms, the growing of the chorus stanza, and, in general, and of a broader system of repetitions of enumerations provide easily recognisable elements belonging to the structure of folk poetry which the poet takes over with a steady hand:

Oh tree, oh tree, / you have heard by the thousands / and shadows by the hundreds / the dog never barks at you. // you wear your ears on a sleeve / I hold my ear in the evening, / my body surrounding it // (...) Only my one ear keeps getting barked at by the moon. // (...) But when autumn becomes winter, / your ears fall from green to yellow / as I saw in mistle hornbeam. // Only my black ear sits unfallen and whole.

(Oh Black Cherry Tree)

The poem, Go Go Go, Little Goat, Go!, is also entirely ludic, grafting on to the typical structure of folk song (direct address, the chorus verse, the system of holorimes etc.) an elevated lexical layer which has a tonal raising effect (“heel”, “the yoke – king” etc.), paradoxical formulations, syllogisms:

I stamp my bone and my shank / and I hit the moon with the year. / I stick my heel where it's freezing cold. // Go, go, go, little goat, go, / My darling bleat, / I will hit you with myself / and with green in the blueness / Here comes the cloud to rain on our parade / loudness, black eggs. // Go, go, go, little goat, go / and I beg of you don't tread / You track open the yoke king / perhaps only beyond the law / only if nobody were to shout / go, go, go, little goat, go.

The poem Autumn is Leaving (from the volume The Winter at the End of the World) is also achieved in the folk register finding itself closer to the elegiac tone of the late Bulgarian poetry. The eerie premonition of death is communicated discreetly through the mediation of expressive folk stereotypes (repetitions which have a compositional role – “I gave up my gold ware with a heavy heart”, the ternary anaphora – “chimeras of ...”, the symmetrical triad adjectival determinants – “robbed, unwatched and unloved”, the enumerations made in threes – “suns”, “stars”, “weather”, “bones”, “skin”, “veins”, the pronominal enclisis, the exploitations of collective expressivity – “the gold ware”, “the leaves”, “the silverware”, “the butchery” etc.)

Autumn is leaving, good riddance / and winter is most welcome / I gave up my gold ware with a heavy heart / from all of the leaves / robbed from my forest / unwatched and unloved / I gave up my gold ware with a heavy heart / for all the silverware / of the first snows / chimeras of suns / chimeras of stars / chimeras of weather / When it's freezing cold / the bones lose in / a thousand skins / over the pantry / all of the veins / hijacked the blood / when the hear beats.

(Autumn is Leaving)

The most original Stănescian text written in a folk style remains without a doubt, Green Leaf of Blueness, which transcends its model through the originality of the linguistic game. An admirable analysis of this poem can be found at Ioana Em.

Peirescu (1989: 27), who interprets it as a sui-generis “ars poetica” of the author.

The poem consists of lines strung through the dislocation and recombination with apparent absurd effects of certain folk traditional poetic schemes, such as introductory sycophantic formulae (“green leaf of...”, “and I said...”), metaphors (“seas take me, they take me”), syntactic figures such as anadiplosis (“on a bone-made whistle/ from the bone of the leg”), anaphora duplicated by caesura (“and I said apple to say seeds, / and I said tree to say boards, / and I said North to say Souths” etc.), the enumerative parallelism (“on a bone-made whistle/ from the bone of the leg/ which sings to me chillingly, / and from the bone of my hand/ whistling for a week, / from the archway bone/ the world’s cold accolade/ over two great bones/ where the polar eyes roam”) (Green Leaf of Blueness)

Starting from this formal matrix, the poet lets his imagination run wild in the combination of words based on purely subjective logic, mostly oxymoronic. Spurred by a ludic drive, he therefore commits the arbitrariness to him, fast made linguistic infractions, breaking both the rules of syntax and word combinations as well as the logical layer of sentences.

The contradiction in terms (“green leaf of blueness”, “apple of pear”, “lie of truth”, “bird of fish”), the transgression of spatial order (“with the head on my belt, / with the heel on my back/ and the eye in the horseshoes”), or the temporal infractions (“running on a field of night/ from one to seven/ from seven to ten/ a cold life has befallen me”), the imaginary denomination (“I see corcoy with joy, the unknown colour”), the random numeral repetitions (“and I drew lots and said six/ and I said one of two”, “as it was grown on my shoulder/ a number two to two, / from three to three there is grass/ and from four to four a necklace,/ and from five to five a tree, / and from six to six a man”), the extension of corporeal poetry over certain external references, (“I feel pain in my fantastic horse”), are but a few such deliberate stylistic “dreadfulments” which remind us of the experiments of avant-garde in general.

What is surprising in such a Stănescu’s text is not the novelty of the games of language themselves but their paradoxical with the folk pattern and the enormous verbal energy, which fuels them. Taking on, but reversing the folk model (“everything I’ve adapted in reverse/ on a whistle of bone”), the poet distances himself indirectly from an entire tradition of folklore processing in the Romanian poetry, rejecting a lot of the common practices of ornamentation of expressionist styling, of the magic of enhancement.

Taken as a pretext, the folk text is transformed in fact into an ars poetica through which the poet “celebrates the act of poetic naming of the world, as a painful attempt of poetry to correct the logic of the real.” (Peirescu, 1981: 31)

This retool of poetry is generally supported by deconstructive procedures (lexical deconstructions, anagrammed permutations of words, the proliferation of negative derivatives, the transgression of borders separating morphological classes, the cancellation of the word as a significant unit of language, reducing it to significant letter, asynchism).

The disembodiment of the word or the unwording are terms created by the poet in order to designate this powerful orientation of his poetry towards narrative categories.

Alongside the multiple games of language, the unending stylistic transformation, the attempt to construct an object of language, a poetic language, which is a threat not only to the usurpation of the linguistic norms in use, but also the infringement of some vital mechanisms of the linguistic system itself (Diaconescu, 1975: 485-486), which constitute the final stage achieved by the lyrical "voice" in its attempt to subjectively remodel the raw material of language.

On John Berryman's Frantic Passage

ABSTRACT

John Berryman (1914-1972) was one of the authors from the "middle generation" as he himself identified it who was mostly concerned in his literary career with the public aspects of confessional poetry, which is also the domain that fulfilled his desire for analysing the relation between public image, personal drama, consumerism and their finality. As his entire life was shadowed by various addictions his work and brilliance as a poet were also influenced by his bad habits that although led to a succession of crises, also turned him to frantic rushes towards his work. The paper entitled On John Berryman's Frantic Passage, aims at discussing John Berryman's strongly autobiographical work from the perspective of the poet's role of preserver of unity in the compositional act and from that of the individual who could not refrain from pursuing his road to self-destruction.

KEYWORDS: confessional poetry, public image, identity

John Berryman's strongly autobiographical work is centered mainly on the "middle generation" author's personal experience and the public aspects of confessional poetry since he had the "habit of responding to each new crisis in his life by producing broad, general, and abstract explanations of his problems, accompanied by avowals to correct his bad habits, and always ending with his frantic hustling in low work and indiscreet as a both a disciplinary corrective to the neurotic patterns recurring elsewhere in his life and as the sole achievement upon which he wagered his life and happiness" (Bové, 1984: 104). Berryman's addictive behaviour (for food as a schoolboy, for liquor as a professor and for women as an adult) "served Berryman as much as it consumed him" and "saved him as much as it sickened him unto death" (Bloom, 1983: 478).

The American author was born on October 25, 1914, in McAlester, Oklahoma, in the family of a banker and a school teacher, and spent the first years of his life in a small town of 3,000 inhabitants (Anadarko) being raised under a rigorous Roman Catholic education. The period of the family's moving to Tampa, Florida was also the time when his parents' marriage began to shake and his father to present the first signs of suicidal tendencies, threatening to drown himself and take little John with him if his wife ever left him. Only two years after this, John Allyn Smith, would deliver his strategy and shoot himself under little John's window. Berryman never visited the grave of his father although he had had a close relationship with him. In the second stanza from Dream Song 76, "Henry's Confession" there is a clear reference to the suicide of his father:

in a mode of death I join my father who dared so long ago leave me.
A bullet on a cotton-clothed Close by a smothering southern sea spreadeagled on an island, by my knee.
— You is from hunger, Mr Bones

(Berryman, apud Marz, 1969: 43)

Dream Song 143 also touches on the same subject:

He was going to swim out with me, forever, and a swimmer strong he was in the phosphorescent Gulf,
but he died on lead.

The mad drive wiped out my childhood.

(Berryman, apud Marz, 1969: 44)

The dominating influence of his mother, Martha Smith, also affected his ability to relate and communicate with the people around him and to deal with his anxieties enabling him to create elaborate defensive myths about his suicidal father as being the cause of all his problems. Martha is probably the root of Berryman's own poetic psyche as well as the trigger of his tendency for extremes as he "believed that there are two kinds of people, and he wanted to be both of them. He seems to have been temperamentally committed to trying to have it both ways. In his private life he tried for monogamy and promiscuity; world travel and serene domesticity; alcoholism and disciplined productivity; scholarship and poetry writing, and so on. The same double tendency is clear in his poetic invitations. 'A man must choose,' says Yeats, but Berryman refused. He sought, if not exactly perfection of the life and of the work, at least a fullness of both, each in the other." (Davis, 1988: 33)

After his father's tragic ending the family moved once again, this time to New York where Martha married another banker, John Angus Martin Berryman. Berryman adopted John and his little brother and kept a close connection with them even after he and their mother got a divorce, ten years into their marriage. John attended the South Kent School in Connecticut, complying with his mother's request and trying to please her over-demanding wishes, although he did not find his place there; he felt misunderstood, bullied and misplaced in a school that concentrated on sports rather than on intellectual activities. After his graduation from the Columbia University (where he took a class from Professor Mark Van Doren who planted the first seeds of a literary career in his mind), he took off to Cambridge, England with a two-year fellowship at a large college where he wrote poetry and read Baudelaire, Yeats, Blake, and the Symbolists and perfected his style.

During his first marriage (eleven years), Berryman had a passionate love affair that almost drove him to suicide and murder (he thought of killing his mistress for not leaving her husband and following him) and that is also the source of inspiration for his Sonnets. The suicidal depression aggravated by heavy drinking and the stress of creation forced him to undergo psychoanalytic treatment (from 1947 to 1953) and destroyed the first and the second of his marriages. His third and last wife was twenty-five years younger than him but this did not prevent him from following his road to self-destruction, and of leaping from the high bridge over the Mississippi.

Besides being a heavy drinker Berryman was also a compulsive womanizer who consumed every relationship with a mixture of passion, agony, guilt and self-torment transposed in his work: "Berryman [...] has taken on the whole modern world and has come to poetic terms with it. At the same time, he has taken on himself, and has come to poetic terms with that too. He has seen the wreck of the modern world (or, better, the modern world insofar as it is a wreck) and the wreck of his personal self in that world. He is not a pessimist but has, rather, what we would have to call a tragic view of human life – with good reason for holding it. Yet, not surprisingly, the tragic view finds its complement in a comic view, his wild and so often devastatingly effective sense of humor. He is preeminently a poet of suffering and laughter." (Marz, 1969: 5)

Berryman's "Elegy, for Alun Lewis" betrays the poet's wish for a quick death:

Little attention we paid to each other alive
 But Death has made us friends. Your death, no mine.
 I am dying slowly; still my lesser race
 Unfitted by the wisdom of the Snake
 (Lucky) for the privilege of your rapidly
 Now envious I hear of that exploit
 And sit down to these poems of yours and grieve.
 Grieve for a stranger made strangely a friend,
 "Killed in an accident on active service."
 All, all an accident? Familiar glowers
 The universal furnace, restless and far less powers
 Who club us wall to wall ahead of them
 In brightening darkness through the narrowing hours.
 You died a strange way. Your blood on my hand.
 – Hand flexing so, white hand of his age
 Hear us stop to look on, what have we done?
 Only the death to come can make us friends.
 But that (soul quicks) grotesque amends
 To the dissolving slain. Take up your nature for The future which these strangers from their minds
 – D loading-dismissed with horror and courage."

(Berryman, apud Pikoulis, 1984: 100)

His poetry also denounces the idea of the poet's role of preserver of unity in the compositional art and of the external modern life. He dramatizes according to his self-image of resentment, guilt and suffering: "Berryman's 'genius' consists not just of his self-admitted guilt, but also of 'blind resentment and bitterness against Fate, Humanity – which can find no proper object – that produces the self-destructive hysterical rage which a hundred times I have conquered and twice I didn't but slapped and beat myself.'" (Bové, 1984: 107)

"To be effective in freeing Berryman from the resentful constraints of his mother and the resolute of the mad-making world he experienced and to release his own resentment against himself and his lovers" (Bové, 1984: 107) Berryman's poetry required a sacrifice from the poet himself: "Crucified upon his own imagination, upon his projection of his own imagined crucifixion, the poet has no choice but to pursue even greater sufferings as the scenes of his own narcissism, as the materials and conditions of his own poetry" (Bové 1984: 107). His rite of passage, his road to transcendence also means the immortality of his poetry.

Homage to Mistress Bradstreet was Berryman's first representative poem that brought him fame and a place among his literary contemporaries and was published in the Parisian Review in 1953 and then, in 1956, as a volume. Throughout his career, Berryman was honored with several prizes such as the Shelley Memorial Award in 1949, the Harriet Monroe Poetry Prize in 1957, the Pulitzer Prize for poetry in 1965, the Bollingen Prize in 1968, and the National Book Award for poetry in 1969.

Homage to Mistress Bradstreet is essentially an interior monologue having a female protagonist – Anne Bradstreet – narrate the story of her life and how it feels to be a special individual in a world that does not understand you. Through the voice of the poet we are revealed how she is imagined in the grave:

The Governor your husband lived so long moved you not, restless, waiting for him? Still, you were a patient woman. –
 I seem to see you pause here still Sylvester, Quarles, in moments odd you pored before a fire and bright eyes on the Lord, all the children still.
 "Simon..." Simon will listen while you read a Song.

Outside the New World winters in grand dark while air lashing high thro' the virgin sands foxes down foxholes sigh, surely the English hear quails, stunned.
 I doubt if Simon than his blasphemous sea, spares from his rigour for your poetry more. We are on each other's hands who care. Both of our worlds unhand us. Lie stark,

My eyes look some mild. Out of maize & air your body's made, and moves. I summon, see, from the tenuries it

(Berryman, apud Marz, 1969: 26)

Not only for Berryman but also for other writers of his generation, the subjects of death and of suicide became very present in their work. Berryman's numerous Dream Songs deal with the idea of suicide and of an encounter with death stand on the line between the physical world and the prospect of a world beyond it. "Unable to name in full the desire for death that seeks, such poetry represents this urge for a presence as a gathering storm of physical instances this side of the leap into the wished-for space of death. The degree to which such a desire and such an act is a creative force, or whether it inimates a destructive potential is a highly debatable issue. The choice of suicide may emanate from a number of circumstances: insurmountable grief, incessant melancholy concerning the human situation, loss, nihilistic despair, death itself" (McGowan 2007: 245).

The Dream Songs questions the ultimate existential dilemma: how to face death, the only constant in life and the transitory action between the realms of the finite and the infinite. By answering the fervent question of whether suicide is the last act of subjective consciousness or the perfect act of self-delusion Berryman ends the uncertainty of the division between understanding the absolute and the act of finitude. However, death, as Kristeva argues, is not what stops the process of creation: "Opposite to religion or alongside it, 'art' takes on murder and moves through it. It assumes murder insofar as art itself practices to consider death the inner boundary of the signifying process. Crossing that boundary is precisely what constitutes 'art.' In other words, it is as if death becomes interiorized by the subject of such a practice; in order to function, he must make himself the bearer of death." (Kristeva, (1974) 2002: 56).

The American author's fascination with the issue of suicide migrates into Berryman's other work (Love & Fame and Delusions, Etc.) which betray the language's inevitable failure to produce the absolute essence of its own capacity: "The abstract nature of language, that produces its own failure to communicate, underpins and simultaneously undermines these attempts to write that which circulates beyond language. The fissure that opens between the impulse to say and the resulting linguistic expression of that impulse becomes an abyssal breath that collapses the fragile possibilities of poetic expression." (McGowan, 2007: 248)

The variety of feelings expressed by the human being experiencing life, the anticipation and fear of death and the pain generated by such feelings manifests itself precisely in the human impossibility in front of it. Berryman acknowledges that our abyssal condition can not be resisted. His "desire for death was strong" but by choosing suicide over life or the natural process of dying the author probably felt that he was capable of taking things into his own hands:

I never changed. My desire for death was strong but not strong enough. I thought this is my chance,

 I can bear it
 I'm not a Buddhist I studied the systems long, the High Systems. Some hunt me, ancient friend, and tell me I am wrong.

The poet mourns from a silence, so little and death created by Berryman becomes the essence of his poetic expression: "The ultimate possibility of human existence, whether perceived in the fantasy of suicide or the search for a language that recedes the essence of the word, has taken the poet's journey through geographies of grief and despair seeking for the elusive Absolute, both here and not. The poet exists in an endless geography of grief, then, conscious." (McGowan, 2007: 255)

As Levinas says,

The structure of pain, which consists in its very actuality, is prolonged further, but up to an unknown that is impossible to translate in terms of light - that is, that is refractory to the intimacy of the self with the ego to which all our experiences return. The unknown of death, which is not given straight off as nothingness but is correlative to an experience of the impossibility of nothingness, signifies that death is a region from which no one has returned and consequently remains unknown as a matter of fact; the unknown of death signifies that the very relationship with death annoys like place in the light, that the subject is in relationship with what does not come from itself. We could say it is in relationship with mystery.

La retraduction : une nécessité ou simplement un exercice de style ?

ABSTRACT: Retranslation – Necessity or Mere Stylistic Fancy?

By considering two successive translations – made by Radu Țițulescu and Irina Mavrodin – of the beginning of Swann and Guermantes, two of Marcel Proust's novels, we aim to prove that retranslation is a necessary stemming out of the need to bring literary works in contemporary, to update them in accordance with the receiving language's evolution in terms of lexical and/or syntactical structures of the phrase, and, not least, to the reader's tastes and demands. Any translation or retranslation is a refection of the original, with the translator free to decide the level of fidelity with certain set boundaries; so much so that each new version retains the specific traits of the original discourse, while at the same time bearing the stamp of the translator's talent and skill.

KEYWORDS: retranslation, plural reading, translation's historicity, naturalizing, reception

1. Argument

Pour attester à l'universalité, l'œuvre littéraire doit être écrite dans une langue de grande circulation, que plusieurs lecteurs puissent comprendre à un niveau satisfaisant ou, comme il arrive dans la plupart du temps, être traduite dans différentes langues, la qualité de la traduction assurant au texte la lisibilité afin de faciliter sa réception.

Le fait qu'une œuvre littéraire jouisse de plusieurs traductions successives soulève la question naturelle, que chaque lecteur se pose : pourquoi a-t-il été nécessaire d'une nouvelle traduction, qui n'est séparée de la précédente que par un bref délai de temps ? S'agit-il d'un « vieillissement » de la première traduction, qui ne correspond plus au nouveau contexte culturel, qui ne satisfait plus le goût des lecteurs des lecteurs de la langue cible ? Ou bien est-ce le résultat d'une évolution naturelle et des transformations survenues dans la langue cible au long du temps, qui imposent une nouvelle traduction, une nouvelle façon d'aborder le texte original et, pourquoi pas, l'utilisation d'une nouvelle technique d'écriture ?

Voici donc quelques questions auxquelles nous essayons de répondre dans l'analyse des traductions de l'intipède de deux romans de Marcel Proust, Du côté de chez Swann et Le côté de Guermantes, la première traduction appartenant à Radu Țițulescu¹ et la seconde à Irina Mavrodin. Les deux traductions sont basées sur les textes de l'édition Gallimard, collection « Bibliothèque de la Pléiade ».

La retraduction de Proust en roumain ne se justifie pas par des changements majeurs au niveau lexical ou syntaxique que le roumain aurait pu enregistrer pendant les quelques dizaines d'années qui séparent la traduction de Radu Țițulescu de celle d'Irina Mavrodin quoique, de façon évidente, le roumain ait, comme toute autre langue par ailleurs, un caractère dynamique, et sa tendance à innover et à s'enrichir soit incontestable. Le goût ou les attentes des lecteurs eux-mêmes n'ont subi de modifications notables, compte tenu du fait que les Roumains vivaient sous le régime communiste dont le but était à l'époque de construire la société socialiste multilatéralement développée et de forger l'homme nouveau, doué d'un profil moral exemplaire, citoyen dévoué jusqu'à l'extrême à l'esprit de l'époque. En tous cas, on essayait de former un prototype de communiste diamétralement opposé à l'atmosphère décadente dépeinte dans les romans de Proust et aux relations interhumaines très complexes qui caractérisaient la société bourgeoise de la fin du XIX^e siècle.

Le motif principal de la retraduction du cycle romanesque proustien serait à notre avis, la nouveauté de l'écriture, l'aspect de la thématisation de cette œuvre, dont l'édification est magnifiquement élaborée et où évoluent des personnages forts et insolites, de sorte que l'intérêt pour l'auteur et pour la façon dont il décrit le déclin de l'aristocratie française ont fasciné les lecteurs roumains, qui ont, dès la première traduction, l'intuition de la valeur de Proust et de sa technique de composition. Dès l'examen même qu'Irina Mavrodin, écrivaine, herméneute et traductrice, a réussi à surprendre dans les traductions qu'elle a faites en 1987 et 1989. Elle s'est démarquée par sa façon de traduire Proust par sa phrase arborescente, par ses nombreuses allusions culturelles, par la polyphonie et l'intertextualité de ses romans. Par ailleurs, la traductrice a été pleinement consciente de la contribution que la traduction de Proust en roumain a eu sur la « flexibilisation du roumain, à son raffinement »². (2009 : 189) Pour autant, il y a également un second motif, subrepticement, qu'on lit entre les lignes – une sorte de fronde contre le régime communiste de la part de la traductrice.

2. Cioculescu /vs./ Mavrodin

Pour faire une bonne traduction, il faut procéder à une intense activité d'information et d'approfondissement non seulement du milieu où l'auteur d'une œuvre s'est formé et a écrit. Une analyse poussée des particularités de son style et de son écriture s'avère être également plus que nécessaire avant de se mettre au travail. Comme un vrai exégète, Irina Mavrodin s'est documentée pour tous avoir sur Proust et sur la genèse de ses romans, sur leurs thèmes poétique et épique. Dès toujours elle qui signe la préface, les notes et les commentaires et même un tableau chronologique avec les données significatives de la vie et de l'œuvre de Proust pour que sa réception par les lecteurs roumains soit totale. Radu Țițulescu s'est limité (uniquement) à « traduire »³ le cycle proustien en roumain, en ne dévoilant rien de l'effort du travail traductif ou du laboratoire de création de Proust; le premier volume du cycle, Swann, traduit par Radu Țițulescu n'a ni avant-propos, ni préface⁵.

Irina Mavrodin a le mérite de prendre comme point de départ la prémisse proussienne de l'œuvre comme « traduction », c'est-à-dire comme communication médiatique de la vérité sur le monde, plus précisément d'une double « traduction », dont d'une double médiation, parce qu'il ne s'agit pas seulement de convertir un système linguistique dans un autre, mais d'un transfert de sens d'une langue dans une autre. Dans chacune des langues en question, en l'absence de dépositaire d'une culture et d'une civilisation à part, nous avons l'endroit où se manifeste une immense pression, une friction qui doit être « domestiquée »⁶, le transfert d'une langue à l'autre se faisant, dans la plupart des cas, avec des pertes stylistiques, sémantiques ou culturelles importantes, saisissables au niveau de l'écriture. Plus un texte est marqué stylistiquement, plus il est difficile à traduire et les difficultés au niveau de l'écriture sont insidieuses, parce que Modelul iranic oferă de știri un mare căldor, ce a marcat limba în care se traduce, în mod definitiv, este aproape de deauna adoptată în mod descori voi și aliori involuntar, ca soluție. Scriitura ireductibilă a originalului este astfel redusă la una deja cunoscută publicului pentru care se face traducerea⁷.

Lorsqu'elle explique le processus effectif de traduction d'un chef d'œuvre, Irina Mavrodin invoque tout d'abord le type spécial de connaissance « immédiate, globale et sensorielle » (Idem : 78), la certitude que l'esprit de la langue n'est pas suffisant pour faire une bonne traduction, que le matériel linguistique avec lequel le traducteur travaille nécessite un façonnage particulier, par lequel on arrive à surmonter sa résistance, on dépasse les aspérités et les frontières des langues, on évite les pièges et les non sens. Autrement dit, le texte doit être compris dans ses particularités les plus intimes, car on comprend mieux ce qu'on détecte soi-même on reconstruit soi-même. (cf. Idem : 78-79).

Loin d'être un simple exercice de style, la traduction est une alchimie, une autre création où le traducteur, tout comme un maître cuisinier, garde les ingrédients du texte source, mais il a la liberté de modifier, en certaines limites, les quantités et parfois il en rajoute un peu, pour que le produit fini gagne en saveur et qu'il satisfasse le goût des consommateurs de la langue cible. La traductrice partage le point de vue d'Anoïne Berman⁸ et invoque le caractère historique de la traduction, sa caduque comme raison d'une nouvelle traduction. Parce que la traduction, comme l'œuvre elle-même, est éphémère sur les sables mouvants de l'évolution des langues, des cultures et des civilisations. C'est pour quoi la traduction s'inscrit dans une série ouverte des traductions, éternellement terminée

En examinant les différences entre les deux traductions et les solutions ponctuelles auxquelles recourent Irina Mavrodin et Radu Țiulescu, au niveau micro-structural, nous nous rallions à l'opinion unanime des traducteurs professionnels qui estiment que toute traduction est parfaite, car elle est un baromètre qui indique les changements produits dans la langue et dans les mœurs au moment où l'on effectue la traduction. Or les deux sont influencées non seulement par les attentes des lecteurs, mais aussi par les exigences des éditeurs et des mandataires. La traduction porte en même temps la marque des mentalités, des connaissances encyclopédiques et du talent du traducteur, chacun contribuant à une meilleure lisibilité du texte et à la naturalisation de l'œuvre dans la langue vers laquelle elle est traduite.

2.1. Niveau microstructural

Les différences les plus évidentes entre les deux traductions apparaissent au niveau lexical, l'emploi d'un terme latin lexème illustrant l'évolution de la société et des coutumes roumaines à travers de longues décennies, que la prédilection du traducteur pour un mot ou synonyme. Ainsi, Radu Țiulescu se sert très souvent du mot nădejde [espoir], qui provient du slave (Swann, 1968 : 4), alors que Irina Mavrodin préfère le mot speranță [espérance] (Swann, 1987 : 36), mot emprunté à l'italien. De même, dans l'intipide Swann, Radu Țiulescu utilise de façon répétée le mot slugă, slugi – p. 4 [domestique, domestiques], un emprunt à l'hongrois, qui, à par sa valeur dénotative de « personne embauchée pour des travaux dans la maison d'un autre » (DEX online) a également une valeur connotative, de personne humble, qui manque de personnalité et de fierté ou de « personne qui soutient et défend aveuglément les intérêts d'un autre en échange d'un avantage matériel » (Idem). Pour la même notion, Irina Mavrodin emploie un terme sans connotations évidentes, servitor, servitori – p. 36 [serviteur, serviteurs], qui provient du français, et pour la sonorité du mot que pour sa « modernité », ce mot est utilisé fréquemment par les lecteurs de la fin du XX^e siècle.

La tendance d'Irina Mavrodin à actualiser certains termes et à utiliser des lexèmes plus connus par la masse des lecteurs apparaît également dans l'intipide Guermites. Par exemple, Radu Țiulescu emploie le mot jupâneasă (1969 : 5), ayant le sens de femme de ménage¹⁰, alors qu'Irina Mavrodin opte pour le mot bonă (1989 : 14), dont le sens est de « gouvernante », femme embauchée par une famille pour élever les enfants. Le choix de ce terme transféré directement du français¹¹ se fait au détriment d'un autre terme, beaucoup plus utilisé en roumain, comme doică, dădacă [nourrice], mais justifié par le désir de la traductrice de garder l'emphase du texte roumain, mise en évidence par les guillemets.

De même, pour le synonyme *valet de pied*¹² Radu Țiulescu utilise comme équivalent le mot lacheu [laquais] (Germantes, 1969 : 6), dans le sens de « serviteur dans les maisons des aristocrates, habillé en livrée » (DEX online), alors que Irina Mavrodin opte pour *servitor*¹³ [serviteur, valet] (Guermites, 1989 : 14), terme plus général, mais qui perd justement l'information portée sur la façon d'être habillé, en livrée, ce qu'il devait accompagner son maître dans le fiacre pour l'aider à y monter ou à en descendre. Des détails liés à un fait culturel devenu obsolète après la disparition des fiacres et l'entrée dans l'ère de l'automobile et des moyens de transports mécanisés sont importants pour les connaisseurs, alors que les lecteurs communs sont plus attirés au terme employé par Irina Mavrodin.

On remarque la même option de la traductrice pour un mot plus connu par la majorité des lecteurs : elle utilise le mot împărăție (Guermantes, 1989 : 15) [empire, royaume], mot dérivé de împărat [empereur] ; Radu-Diulescu préfère le mot empire, le correspondant direct du mot français imperiu (Guermantes, 1969 : 7). Les Roumains n'ont pas eu d'empires, ils ont eu une histoire mouvementée, et ont été plusieurs fois annexés à d'autres empires. Dans leur mental, le mot împărăție a une connotation affective, ce mot est beaucoup plus utilisé dans les contextes populaires ou familiers. En plus, le mot a également développé d'autres valeurs plus générales, de direction¹⁴, de pouvoir (pas nécessairement la direction d'un pays par un empereur).

Il faut également remarquer qu'Irina Mavrodin utilise des termes plus précis qui se réfèrent aux sons faits par les oiseaux. Ainsi, elle se sert du terme ciripit [gazouillement] (Guermantes, 1989 : 14), alors que Radu-Diulescu emploie *piuit*¹⁵ [piaulement] (Guermantes, 1969 : 5). De même, pour parler du bruit que font les trains en entrant ou en sortant de la gare, Irina Mavrodin opte pour le terme șuierat [sifflement], (Swann, 1987 : 35), alors que Radu-Diulescu utilise *fluierat*¹⁶ [sifflement] (p. 4).

La traductrice aime nuancer les termes afin que le lecteur roumain puisse ressentir le plaisir de la lecture du texte prousien, tout comme le lecteur français. Ainsi, egoismul nervoșilor [l'égoïsme des nerveux] (Guermantes, 1969 : 6) de la traduction de Radu-Diulescu devient pretinsa "sensibilitate" a oamenilor cu nervi delicați [la prétendue "sensibilité" des gens aux nerfs délicats] (1989 : 15)¹⁷ dans la traduction d'Irina Mavrodin. La phrase Je me sentais péniblement bossué... (Proust 1994 : 14) a comme équivalent chez Radu-Diulescu la construction mă simțeam neplăcut deformat [je me sentais désagréablement déformé] (Guermantes, 1969 : 6), alors que Irina Mavrodin est plus sensible aux nuances et donne pour équivalent la structure mă simțeam dureros de umflat [je me sentais douloureusement gonflé] (1989 : 15), ce qui rend parfaitement en roumain l'expression de Proust.

La même attention aux rigueurs du texte prousien est à remarquer à travers toute le processus de transfert des sens du français en roumain, Irina Mavrodin faisant preuve non seulement de fidélité par rapport aux structures en usage en roumain actuel, mais aussi à la plasticité, à l'éclat du texte prousien. La structure souffler la lumière (Du côté de chez Swann, 1993 : 13) est rendue par une neutralisation totale dans la traduction de Radu-Diulescu, par sting lumina [j'éteins la lumière] (1968 : 3), qui ne tient pas compte du fait qu'à l'époque de Proust on utilisait encore des bougies ou des ampoules à gaz, par ce que l'électrification était rare même dans les maisons des aristocrates, c'est pour quoi Irina Mavrodin préfère l'expression sting lumânarea [j'éteins la bougie] (1987 : 35). Dans le même para-graphie, Radu ∇ io ∇ les ∇ tu ∇ se ∇ se ∇ rad ∇ 'une expression un peu bizarre en roumain (*voiam să pun la o parte volumul*¹⁸) ; Irina Mavrodin la remplace par voiam să pun jos volumul [je voulais poser le volume (sur la table de Cheve)].

2.2. Niveau macrostructural

La phrase proussienne, gigantesque, arborescente, extrêmement complexe « ouïl d'exploration pour les plus grandes profondeurs ou hauteurs, donne l'impression d'être formée d'innombrables tronçons ajoutés les uns aux autres par l'enjambement de qui et de que répétés »¹⁹ (Mavrodin, 2006 : 79), constitue une vraie pierre de touche pour le traducteur, que l'on expérimente qu'il soit comme l'observait déjà Irina Mavrodin dès la traduction des premiers romans du Œuvre, la phrase proussienne n'est pas souple, fluide, féminine, par conséquent, elle est une vraie machine [...] puternică și greoaie, care găfăie din toate încheieturile, lansată obsesiv, cu toată forța, spre infime particule de necunoscut, care i se sustrag, pe care le prinde, care îi scapă din nou, retrăgându-se în sălăuri de mai profunde, sau de mai la suprafață, pe care le apucă iarăși²⁰.

La difficulté du traducteur est de réussir à garder son rythme, sa cadence et son ampleur. S'il la rompt l'effetsyllabique de l'original se perd. S'il la garde comme elle, il doit trouver une solution intelligente de surmonter la résistance du roumain, pour que le résultat n'en soit pas une phrase rocambolesque, difficile à suivre, où la méaphore, la méonymie et les synchésies proussiennes s'empennent. Irina Mavrodin compare, à juste titre, la phrase de Proust à une grosse pâte, mais qui est encore suffisamment liquide pour couler « parmi tous les incidents de la matière donc elle s'empare, s'arrêtant comme si elle était solidifiée, pour redémarrer ensuite, coulant encore et encore, jusqu'à boucher également les plus petits trous et homogénéiser l'ensemble²¹ » (Idem : 79).

On sent des responsabilités du traducteur et de la nécessité de fidélité vis-à-vis d'un tel texte, la traductrice estime que la phrase proussienne est une unité prosodique, qui ne commente pas par hasard par un certain mot pour finir par un autre, parce que l'ordre des mots, les reprises, les répétitions, les mots-clés ou les lemmes ont une importance particulière pour obtenir l'intention spécifique pour la phrase de Proust ∇ 'est pourquoi, dans la mesure du possible, la traduction doit respecter la longueur de cette phrase et l'ordre des mots et dans la mesure où le roumain s'y prête et s'y plie, l'amplitude, le rythme et ses compliqués couronnements et reprises.

Nous illustrons la nécessité de respecter les tournures des phrases proussiennes par un exemple tiré de *Le côté des Guermantes*²², où l'on peut facilement remarquer les inspirées solutions ponctuelles qu'Irina Mavrodin trouve pour ne violenter ni l'ordre des mots, ni la ponctuation du roumain. Chez la traductrice, l'impression que le verbe est séparé de son objet direct n'est pas si saillante que dans la traducttion de Radu Țulescu, qui ne sépare pas par deux virgules la subordonnée relative explicative de sa régissante : nu primise de la portarul care nu ne cunoștea încă²³ semnele... [n'avais pas reçu du portier qui ne nous n' connaissait pas encore, les signes...]. En plus, Irina Mavrodin prend soin de ne pas changer le sens des phrases (ex. : mă adaptez tot atât de greu la noile lucruri pe cât de ușor le păreșeam pe cele vechi [je m'adaptais aussi difficilement aux nouvelles choses que je ne qu'issais les anciennes]), comme le fait Radu Țulescu, qui affirme le contraire (asimilam tot atât de lesne lucrurile noi pe cât de ușor le păreșeam pe cele vechi [j'assimilais avec la même aisance les nouvelles choses que je ne qu'issais les anciennes]). De même, la traductrice trouve une tournure plus proche du sens que Proust transmet au lecteur francophone par l'emprunt du sens de déracinement de la vieille servante après l'emménagement dans une nouvelle maison, alors que Radu Țulescu transgresse l'un des principes français de la calophilie, celui de ne pas terminer la phrase sur un verbe.

De aceea, dacă-mi bătusem joc de ea care era adânc mâhnită că trebuie să păreșească un imobil în care eram „atât de stimați de toți”, și își făcuse bagajele plângând, potrivit riturilor de la Combray, și spunând că fosta noastră casă era superioară tuturor celorlalte case, în schimb eu, care asimilam foarte ușor le păreșeam pe cele vechi, m-am apropiat de bătrâna noastră servitoare când am văzut că instalarea într-o casă în care nu primise de la portarul care nu ne cunoștea încă, semnele de respect necesare bunei sale hrane morale, aproape o prăpădise.

(traduction de Radu Țulescu, Guermantes, 1969 : 5-6)

De aceea, chiar dacă-mi bătusem joc de ea pentru că, nefericită că trebuie să păreșească un imobil unde „toată lumea ne prețuia atât de mult”, își făcuse bagajele plângând, conform ritualului de la Combray, și declarând că nu vom mai găsi nicio dată o casă ca aceea de unde plecăm, m-am simțit aproape de bătrâna noastră servitoare când am văzut – eu, care mă adaptez tot atât de greu la noile lucruri pe cât de ușor le păreșeam pe cele vechi – că instalarea într-o casă unde nu primise din partea portarului, ce nu ne cunoștea încă, semnele de prețuire necesare bunei ei hrăniri morale, o răfundase într-o stare vecină cu moartea.

(traduction d'Irina Mavrodin, Guermantes, 1989 : 14)

Dépendant de Radu Țulescu a le mérite d'avoir offert avec beaucoup d'honnêteté, la première bonne traduction de Marcel Proust en affrontant les difficultés inhérentes de la première reprise de faire connaître au public roumain quelques volumes du cycle proustien, sans pour autant le trahir (par ailleurs, il ne s'est même pas proposé de buter) l'envergure de la traduction faite par Irina Mavrodin.

3. Les notes du traducteur

Les notes commentaires du traducteur sont particulièrement importantes pour faciliter la lecture et la naturalisation du texte proustien. Radu Țulescu ne signe pas lui-même les préfaces et les notes du traducteur qui, comme nous avons précédemment montré (voir Note 5) du V^e volume du cycle, Guermantes, n'y figurent même pas. Au premier volume, Swann, l'avant-propos esquisse par Ovid Crohmăniceanu, un critique littéraire avisé, bon connaisseur de l'œuvre de Proust qui en fait une ample synthèse et montre sa spécificité. Pour autant, on ressent le manque d'explications et d'informations sur le texte que le traducteur, en tant qu'écrivain de second degré, aurait dû fournir aux lecteurs non seulement pour les éclairer sur des faits historiques et culturels que Proust insère dans son texte, mais également sur les options de traduction²⁴, sur l'historicité²⁵ de certains termes, sur des erreurs dans la citation²⁶ des écrivains français, sur la déformation²⁷ volontaire de mots que Proust utilise et les met dans la bouche de ses personnages qui manquent d'éducation. D'espérons pourquoi la traduction d'Irina Mavrodin vient compléter le désir d'information du lecteur roumain et satisfaire ses attentes et ses exigences.

Conclusions

Loin d'être simplement un exercice de style, la retraduction d'un classique littéraire lui confère dans une langue étrangère non seulement de valeur, de force et de vigueur, mais elle prouve en même temps l'option créatrice, le choix inventif qui porte la marque de la personnalité et du talent du traducteur qui refait l'ouvrage, la réinterprète, en lui offrant un nouvel éclairage.

Comme toute traduction est finalement une interprétation personnelle et une nouvelle vision sur l'original, la nécessité et le désir de retraduire un texte littéraire devient une sorte de garantie qu'un auteur mérite d'être lu et connu par une nouvelle génération, ayant des aspirations différentes, que le traducteur doit satisfaire.

La comparaison que nous avons faite entre les deux traductions de Dostoïevski et de Mavrodin met en évidence en égale mesure l'évolution des goûts des lecteurs roumains et une certaine dynamique du roumain qui tend à s'enrichir avec de nouvelles structures, mais encore un fait historique moins évident peut-être pour le lecteur non avisé, à savoir la préférence de Dostoïevski pour les mots authentiques, dans son désir de «naturaliser» Proust et de l'«implanter» dans le sol littéraire roumain, d'autant plus que la période de décadence et de la noblesse française n'était pas inconnue dans la Roumanie d'après la seconde guerre mondiale. D'ailleurs l'époque où le pays subissait un processus de russification et de consécration du communisme.

D'autre part, la préférence d'Irina Mavrodin pour les néologismes, les mots d'origine française et italienne est une manière subtile et subversive de résister et de fronder contre le communisme, dans sa période la plus noire, lorsque les valeurs occidentales étaient mises à l'index et lorsque tout ce qui avait l'idéologie bourgeoise était durement puni. Par la retraduction de Proust, Irina Mavrodin a réalisé un vrai pont entre deux langues et deux cultures rapprochées par leurs origines, que par leurs affinités, mais artificiellement séparées par le régime communiste au début de la Roumanie, fait pour lequel nous croyons que sa traduction gagne un plus de valeur et de consistance, sans pour autant nier les mérites de Dostoïevski, un vrai pionnier de la traduction de Proust en Roumanie !

- ¹ La première traduction de Proust en roumain a été faite par Radu Țiulescu, Swann, roman paru en 1945 et publié à Bucarest par la Maison d'édition des Fondations Royales. Țiulescu a été républié en 1968 chez la maison d'édition « Biblioteca pentru toți » (BPT, La bibliothèque pour tous), dans la collection « Editura pentru literatură » (L'édition pour la littérature), variante qui se trouve à la base de notre analyse. Țiulescu est toujours en 1968, à la Maison d'édition pour la littérature universelle, que Vladimir Streinu publie În partea dinspre Swann [Du côté de chez Swann], le premier volume de À la recherche du temps perdu, qui ne fait pour autant pas partie du corpus analysé. La dernière traduction, celle d'Irina Mavrodin, garde les mêmes titres, à savoir Swann (1987) et Guermites (1989), les deux étant publiés par la maison d'édition « Univers ».

- ³ La maison d'édition BPT avertit les lecteurs du volume Guermites que la traduction de Radu Țiulescu a été révisée par sa femme, Eugenia Țiulescu, alors qu'Irina Mavrodin a révisé elle-même sa traduction, comme elle avoue dans son livre Despre traducere – literal și în toate sensurile [Sur la traduction – littéral dans tous les sens].

- ²⁴ Dans la note 122 de Swann la traductrice mentionne le fait que chez Proust beaucoup de mots se répètent dans une sorte d'insistance stylistique volontaire, la reprise du verbe dire étant parfois obsessive. La traductrice choisit de l'éviter, au maximum possible, par l'alternance du verbe a zice [dire] avec a spune [affirmer] ou a declara [déclarer]. (Mavrodin, 1987 : 399)
- ²⁵ Dans la note 21 de Guermantes, Irina Mavrodin explique que le lexème ennui du texte original n'est pas employé par Proust avec son sens actuel de plictis, plictiseală [tafard, manque d'intérêt], mais avec celui du XVII^e siècle, sens gardé dans le parler populaire. (Mavrodin, 1989 : 527). De même, dans la note précédente, la traductrice a écrit l'annotation sur le lexème sabraque, forme parallèle de chabraque (R. pătura care se pune sub șaua calului) et qui, dans un emploi régional, désigne une fille / femme de mœurs légères et qui, par un glissement de sens, renvoie dans le texte au fait dans lequel voyageait la duchesse de Guermantes.
- ²⁶ Dans la note 16 du même volume, Irina Mavrodin a écrit l'annotation que Proust a écrit de façon erronée un vers de Dornelle Seigneur, que de vertus vous nous faites haïr !, en mentionnant que la variante correcte est O ciel, que de vertus vous me faites haïr ! (Mavrodin, 1987 : 394)
- ²⁷ La traductrice mentionne dans la note 48 que parantèse est la forme incorrecte de parantèle, utilisée par la vieille servante française, et qu'elle a transférée en roumain une forme toute aussi incorrecte, famelie. (Mavrodin, 1987 : 394)

ABSTRACT: Issues of fragmentary writing in Hôtel St. Georges by Rachid Boudjedra

Based on the distinction fragmental/fragmentary writing (Marcel Gouard, Le Roman français postmoderne. Une écriture turbulente), this study analyses Rachid Boudjedra's novel Hôtel Saint-Georges from three different perspectives: the game between the fragments composing the modularly structure of the novel, submitted in any point to a desynchronizing/resynchronizing process; the impossibility of a stable meaning of the fragment or of the text as a whole; the fragment as the most suitable form of the memory writing but also of the ambiguity, variation, plurality.

KEYWORDS: fragmental, fragmentary, memory, writing, variation

Introduction

Le fragmentaire est incontestablement un point de convergence de l'écriture romanesque contemporaine, au sens en ce qui concerne la mise en place d'un univers narratif, que la construction du sujet.

Dans ce qui suit nous nous proposons d'analyser les enjeux de l'écriture fragmentale/fragmentaire dans le roman Hôtel Saint-Georges de l'écrivain algérien Rachid Boudjedra. Dans une perspective analytique, notre réflexion visera d'une part les particularités de la structure du récit et, d'autre part, la polyphonie, la variation, la pluralité d'un texte ouvert.

Hôtel Saint-Georges : l'écriture romanesque entre histoire et « chroniques intimes »

Iconoclaste, subversif, scandaleux, agressif son et seulement quelques-unes des modalités de désigner l'écrivain Rachid Boudjedra qui, malgré sa personnalité controversée et ses diverses prises de position inouïes, s'est imposé pendant les dernières décennies comme l'un des maîtres de la littérature-monde. En témoignent son œuvre impressionnante, publiée au même temps en français qu'en arabe, dont nous rappelons quelques titres: poésie: Pour ne plus rêver (1965); essais: La Vie quotidienne en Algérie (1971), Naissance du cinéma algérien (1971), Journal palestinien (1972); romans: La Répudiation (1969), L'Insolation (1972), Topographie idéale pour une agression caractérisée (1975), L'Escargot entêté (1977), Les 1001 années de la nostalgie (1979), Le Vainqueur de coupe (1981), Le Démantèlement (1982), La Macération (1984), La Pluie (1987), La Prise de Gibraltar (1987), Fascination (2000), Les figuiers de Barbarie (2010) Hôtel Saint-Georges (2011), Printemps (2014) ; scénarios et biographies / Chronique des années de braise (Palme d'or du Festival de Cannes, 1975) et Ali aux pays des mirages (« Tani d'Or » du Festival de Carthage, 1980).

S'il fallait résumer l'œuvre par une seule caractéristique majeure, elle serait sans doute l'articulation de l'histoire collective et individuelle, « inextricablement liées et déterminantes l'une de l'autre [...] La sociale, le politique, le culturel sont considérés par rapport aux traumatismes qu'ils provoquent chez l'individu son objet d'une remise en question menée sur le mode subversif. De ce point de vue, l'œuvre de Boudjedra pourrait se résumer en "une seule et même phrase" qui se répète avec des auteurs différents » (Bonn, Nage & Mdarhi-Alaoui, 1996). « Tous mes romans », affirme l'écrivain, « sont des "révisions" lancées du passé et du présent de mon pays dont on ne dit pas assez l'histoire catastrophique. Moi je la ressasse parce que j'ai mal à l'Algérie que j'aime passionnément parce qu'elle a trop souffert » (2010).

Mais, s'il reconnaît que ses romans se nourrissent du « perpétuel ravage humain » (Ibidem), que ce soit sur le plan personnel ou historique, l'écrivain se garde bien de ne pas confondre, de ne pas mélanger avec l'idéologie, tout en faisant de l'histoire « un adossement fondamental » (Ibidem) de ses romans, ce qui leur confère « une ouverture, une amplitude et une charge émotionnelle irremplaçable » (Ibidem).

Faillé par l'écriture, Boudjedra éprouve dès lors le « besoin vital d'écrire pour survivre » (Ibidem), pour « adoucir un peu la douleur du monde » (2003). L'écrivain est bien conscient de la position qu'il occupe sur le territoire des lettres algériennes / fonder une littérature de la subjectivité, gommée dans le monde arabo-musulman, renouveler, quels qu'en soient les risques (tout comme Salman Rushdie, pendant la « décennie noire » algérienne, il est condamné à mort par les intégristes islamistes) l'écriture romanesque en défiant les interdits en faisant l'hypothèse sociale, en brisant le fameux « triangle tabou » sexualité – religion – politique, dont il parle dans de nombreux entretiens. Pour autant, malgré sa réputation mondiale rapidement acquise, il ne quittera jamais le territoire des lettres algériennes, avouant qu'il désire écrire algérien et que sa seule source d'inspiration est l'Algérie / « J'ai la passion de l'Algérie et je n'ai nulle envie d'écrire sur autre chose. Mais quand j'écris sur l'Algérie, j'écris sur l'homme. Mes personnages sont universels, et mes thèmes, le destin, la souffrance, le rapport entre la grande histoire et l'histoire intime, peuvent toucher tout le monde quelle que soit sa nationalité » (2011).

Le roman Hôtel Saint-Georges n'y fait pas exception. En fait, selon les aveux du romanier, il a été un événement consacré à la guerre d'Algérie, auquel appartenaient aussi Le vainqueur de coupe, Le démantèlement et Les figuiers de Barbarie, mais il semble bien qu'il soit aussi le point final du long roman à attention autobiographique, que Rachid Boudjedra a inauguré avec La Répudiation. Hôtel Saint-Georges est dans la vision de son auteur, « un texte de compassion, un texte sur la souffrance des hommes, quand bien même ces hommes sont des soldats français ou des harkis chargés des basses besognes, de la morture, c'est-à-dire des hommes qui ont fait du mal à l'Algérie. Plus encore que d'apaisement, je parlerai de pardon » (Ibidem). En ce qui Concerne le choix du titre, l'option pour le nom du plus ancien hôtel d'Alger, Constance par les Français, est le « symbole de la réconciliation possible » (Ibidem). Le roman a comme point de départ des faits et des personnes réelles :

Mon roman n'explique pas, n'analyse pas. Il donne à voir et à s'émouvoir. Les temps de la guerre d'Algérie ne sont toujours pas réglés et ne le seront jamais. Mon roman s'est inspiré de personnes réelles ; Kader le harki, Jeanne, je les ai connus. Et j'essaie ici de poser un problème jamais abordé, celui du rôle vaine des soldats français envoyés à l'abattre et qui ont participé à la guerre souvent malgré eux. C'est le cas de Jean, un ébéniste diplômé de l'école Boule et qui se retrouve à fabriquer des cercueils minables pour les soldats qui ont perdu la vie et à qui l'on n'a pas le moyen de proposer une sépulture décente. Jean est fasciné par l'Algérie, mais il ne découvre le pays que dans son malheur, et il se dit : Dans la lettre qu'il écrit à Jeanne, il exprime 30 ans de vie muette, il raconte ce qu'il n'avait jamais osé dire, il met fin à la schizophrénie dans laquelle son silence l'avait plongé. Jean a été détruit par la guerre ; quand il écrit, il est déjà mort (Ibidem).

Le livre amène donc en premier plan, deux des êtres individuels, celui de Jean, l'ébéniste français anéanti par la guerre, et celui de Kader, le harki, métricien au service de la France et responsable d'actes de violence extrêmes infligés à ses compagnons. Deux des êtres qui se croisent dans « le vide sidéral de l'impuissance humaine devant la complexité de l'Histoire » (Temlali, 2007) et qui sont traités par une écriture marquée par la même volonté obsessionnelle de ressassier le passé, questionné, atténué, mis au pied du mur. L'auteur démolit aussi assidûment que dans les autres romans les mythes des ancêtres, si héroïques dans l'imagerie commune qu'ils en deviennent des enlacements et des immémorielles. L'Histoire nationale n'est pas importante qu'en ce qu'elle fait la présence anxieuse des personnages et de leurs rêves prodigieux, régulièrement écrits ou refoulés. Elle n'a de permanence qu'en ce qu'elle jette la lumière sur les racines de cette névrose algérienne qui a produit le FLN, le FIS, l'autoritarisme, l'islamisme et les massacres collectifs des années 90 (Ibidem).

Deux personnages broyés par la machine infernale de la guerre, incapables de guérir, seulement de survivre, d'assumer et de se libérer, grâce à des confessions tardives, le poids de l'horreur qu'ils ont subie (Jean) ou provoquée (Kader).

Après la mort du père et après avoir reçu sa longue lettre de confession posthume, Jeanne fait deux voyages en Algérie : le premier seule, afin de respecter le dernier vœu de Jean – répandre quelques grammes de ses cendres dans la baie d'Alger, afin qu'il repose à jamais dans le pays qu'il avait tant aimé, malgré son malheur ; le deuxième, pour revenir sur les pas du père, pour comprendre sa passion, en compagnie de certains membres de sa famille de Raïs. La vie de Jean et de sa famille va ainsi interférer avec celle d'une famille algérienne inconnue jusque là et l'arrivée de Jeanne à Alger agit comme un révélateur de la vie cachée » (Ibidem) de cette famille à « ses infantes » (Ibidem). Ainsi, « dans les interstices de l'Histoire, celle de la Révolution et du monde, s'écrivent d'autres chroniques intimes » (Ibidem).

Tour à tour, à par Jeanne, Jean et Kader, neuf autres personnages prennent la parole et révèlent des bribes de vies vécues dans le tourbillon hallucinatoire de la violence, de la névrose, de la déréliction, du mensonge, du cynisme. Le chef de la famille est Sidi Mohammed, le patriarche mélomane, le leur raffiné d'Ibn Khaldoun et de Lafontaine, père de Raïf, de Zigo, de Yasmina et de Nabila, profondément attaché à la cause de son pays. Un homme de la réussite, aguerri par la vie passée « dans les prisons françaises, les faillites françaises, les douleurs françaises, les mépris français »¹ (HSG, p. 157), épris d'une épouse fanasque, mais restant en retrait par rapport à sa famille, avec laquelle, malgré les apparences, la communication est difficile.

Le geste de Sidi Mohammed de céder à Nabila, à la suite des insistances de sa femme, à son oncle maternel sans enfant et à l'origine de la vie raïfée de sa fille. Elle sera violée pendant son adolescence par l'oncle collabo et le lourd secteur qu'elle confie à Jean, lors de l'une de leurs conversations à l'Hôtel Saint-Georges, la marquera pour la vie. Médée n'insallée en France, elle raïf à Jean, lors d'une rencontre accidentelle, son errance sentimentale, son incapacité de surmonter le trauma antérieur, mais, comme la première fois, elle lui reste opaque à ses confessions et disparaît.

Donnée de la gravité de son geste qui a gâché aussi sa vie, le père l'assume lucidement, tout en admettant son refus ou son incapacité de sauver sa fille : « Je n'ai jamais pu (ou voulu) penser au malheur de Nabila » (HSG, p. 160) et par cela, la faille qui les sépare, malgré la force des sentiments qui les unissent toujours Sidi Mohammed qui surprend l'essence du personnage de Nabila, qui « n'était pas dans le malheur, elle incarnait le malheur même » (HSG, p. 251).

Yassin Temlali voit dans le personnage de Raïf, « un patriarche moderne et compréhensif » (op. cit.). Il est en quelque sorte, le maillon le plus sensible de la chaîne familiale. Zigo, avec lequel il entretient une relation compliquée, affirme :

Tu as toujours réussi ce que tu as entrepris. Tu as toujours eu des principes, parfois rigides. Inhumains. Mais tu y es venu. À la fin de la guerre, tu aurais pu être ministre, mais tu as préféré l'instabilité à la faït. Et même ça, on ne l'a reproché. Tes thers ça marades de maquis, qui, pour la majorité d'entre eux, ont très vite retourné la veste... Vous aviez raïf le cochon, mais vous aviez payé le tribut du sang comme tout le monde. (HSG, p. 240).

Par une subtile mise en abîme (où s'agit-il plutôt d'au-delà de l'au-delà ?), Boudjedra fait de l'écrivain communiste subversif son porte-parole. Par exemple, Raïf a la même conception de l'histoire qui s'actualise dans Hôtel Saint-Georges :

Il ne s'intéressait pas aux grands axes de l'histoire, ses guerres, ses armistices, ses résistances, ses patentes, ses attouchements et ses falsifications, mais au revers de la médaille, aux détails et aux petits mouvements presque imperceptibles. Insaisissables, fuyants. Il s'intéressait aux petites gens qui la font et l'histoire, presque par hasard, presque sans le savoir, ou sans savoir ce qu'ils font et ce qu'ils ont fait. Eux, donc, ne faisant qu'exécuter les ordres, aller à la bouillotte, boire – naïvement – qu'ils allaient remodeler le monde grâce à la guerre, aux massacres, aux génocides, à la torture. [...] Raïf disait : "L'histoire, mais ce n'est qu'une accumulation de futilités ! Rien que du filigrane ! " et ça l'histoire... (HSG, p. 226).

Même situation pour la passion pour l'Algérie, qui, selon Raç, « n'est pas un pays, c'est une drogue » (HSG, p. 30). Au-delà de cette image d'homme fort, insaisissable mais généreux, Raç se définit lui-même comme un être tourmenté par ses passions insouviées, qui vit dans l'ambiguïté, qui se cherche et s'abandonne en proie à un « désarroi permanent », à une « épouvante incurable » (HSG, p. 137).

Pour fuir le malheur, Raç multiplie les expériences sexuelles, qu'il avoue ensuite, incapable de maîtriser un besoin pervers ou sadique, à sa femme Mitç. Si la compréhension de la pitié de celle-ci le rend encore plus malheureux, le confort avec ses amantes passagères lui apporte une sorte de fraîcheur nécessaire à mon équilibre amoureux. [...] et n'est qu'avec les femmes, aux moments que je passais avec elle dans la nudité d'une chambre spacieuse dans laquelle s'engouffraient un peu de porcelaine, que je ressuscitais. Que je revenais à un état d'extraordinaire lucidité. Proche de l'extase ? Ou était-ce l'extase même ? La jubilation dans son sens mystique, telle que la décrivent saint Augustin et Ibn Arabi (HSG, p. 137).

Malgré l'insécurité de leur passion, la relation avec sa femme française Michelle demeure compliquée, le personnage évoquant à un certain point de ses confessions, « le flou caractéristique de nos rapports » (HSG, p. 175). Antenne portuse de valises, arabe très jeune à la cause de l'Algérie, installé à Bugeaud après l'indépendance, ensuite médecin à Alger, Mitç partage avec Raç une passion inaltérable pour son pays d'adoption : « [...] j'ai toujours l'Algérie dans la peau » (HSG, p. 37).

Bien qu'après de Mitç il atteint un équilibre précaire, Raç est désabilisé par les rapports difficiles avec le reste de sa famille : « avec tous ces désordres, ces brisures et ces fêlures, je ne savais plus où j'en étais. Le faras familial. Des zones glauques et visqueuses. Un monde immonde qui me hançait jusqu'à l'hallucination » (HSG, p. 137). La relation la plus tendue, faite paradoxalement d'amour et d'hostilité, est celle avec son frère cadet Ali, que très jeune, il surnomme Zigo. Commandant de bord à Air Algérie, Ali est en quelque sorte un double en négatif de Raç, qui s'est réfugié « dans l'ironie, la dérision et l'excès » (HSG, p. 82). La complicité du fils d'Ali avec les membres d'un réseau terroriste qui projettent d'assassiner Raç, décrie d'ailleurs leurs rapports. Pour autant les deux frères autrefois très proches et très complices ne peuvent nier une évidence : ils sont tous les deux des êtres de l'excès.

Il est d'ailleurs le trait qui les relie à leur neveu Kamel, qui se définit à son tour, comme « un être de l'insouvenance. Jamais satisfait. Jamais repu. Jamais comblé » (HSG, p. 90). Professeur cardiologue, chef de clinique, avide de pouvoir, raffiné, quant à drogues, grand amateur de femmes, Kamel cache en réalité un profond malaise : un manque de confiance en soi et un trauma profond du à l'incompréhension d'un père trop absent par lequel il s'estime trahi et dont il n'hésitera pas à profaner le cadavre. Ses excès, sur tous ses terrains qui le poussent à des gestes extrêmes, font de Kamel un marginal dans une famille qui, dans sa vision, « n'est là d'ailleurs pas une famille, mais un marécage familial souvent gluant et sordide » (HSG, p. 63). Un homme qui « avait toujours vécu dans les chimères et les mythes » (HSG, p. 106) sera finalement exécuté par ses complices trafiquants de drogues.

Avec ses parents, Hamid et Yasmina, et avec sa sœur Leïla, Kamel partage le lourd secret d'une grand-mère paternelle prosaïque, que Leïla compare à un véritable personnage faulknerien, et du crime perpétré par le grand-père contre l'aman de celle-ci. Toutefois la marque le caractère des personnages et l'univers familial ontore plus affablan

Tous ces narrateurs qui prennent leur à leur la parole, pour éclairer leurs rapports familiaux ou leur participation à l'histoire, confèrent au récit l'épaisseur et la densité du vécu qui échappent souvent aux chroniques historiques objectives.

Hôtel Saint-Georges : multiplicité et fragmentaire

La grande provocation pour Rachid Boudjedra, afin de faire entendre toutes les voix des personnages et de faire entrer toutes leurs histoires intimes dans un récit qui ne s'enlise pas, était de trouver le type de narration et la forme littéraire la plus adaptée à son projet. La narration à la première personne et le non-feuilleté de la confession assuraient l'authenticité locale et l'autonomie des voix. Le fragment comme forme littéraire ouverte, mobile, et inattendue était également le meilleur choix qui s'offrait à l'écrivain pour ouvrir l'ensemble des confessions fragmentaires, pour suivre le mouvement parfois sismique de la pensée, pour rendre les ellipses, les moments suspendus de la narration « Le fragment lieu même de la production de la pensée, manifeste au contraire la vie, celle de l'esprit d'une parole que celle du rapport au monde d'autre parole » (Angé, 2007 : 27). Nous emprunons le syntagme forme-texte à Caroline Angé (Ibidem) parce qu'il nous semble le plus approprié pour préciser notre propre point de vue : nous ne considérons pas le fragment un genre en soi, nous l'envisageons comme une forme littéraire variable, malléable, qui peut prendre les apparences les plus diversifiées et de la sorte, participer de tout genre littéraire.

En outre, nous nous plaçons dans la perspective de Marcel Gouard qui, dans Le roman français postmoderne. Une écriture turbulente, dislingue en le texte fragmentaire et le texte fragmental : « Dans le premier cas, ce qui est en cause se désolait inattendu (œuvre posthume) soit incomplète (manuscrit endommagé ou par ailleurs perdu). Dans le second cas, l'adjectif fragmental, désigne une écriture, une esthétique construite » (2003 : 82).

À la base de cette distinction, nous retrouvons l'analyse de la problématique du fragmental par Paul Valéry, à laquelle Jean-Louis Galay consacre l'étude « Problèmes de l'œuvre fragmentale / Valéry » (in « Poétique », n° 31, 1977). À la conception de l'œuvre comme système clos, élaboré, « comme fonction du désordre et de l'insubilité » s'oppose celle du texte fragmental « inorganisé, hétérogène [...], subvertissant le principe d'Unité et donc celui de Vérité [...]. L'écriture fragmentaire apparaît au contraire comme une écriture spontanée, discontinue, qui ne délivre que des Vérités provisoires » (Ibidem).

Nous remarquons aussi la convergence de l'affirmation de Marcel Gouard – fragmental, désigne une écriture, une esthétique concrète – et de celle de Caroline Angé : « le texte fragmentaire dans son mode d'apparaître rend lisible et visible une stratégie de l'objet lui-même » (op. cit. : 24). Dans le cas de Hôtel Saint-Georges, il est évident qu'il s'agit d'un choix délibéré, grâce auquel le roman n'a pas d'équivalent dans ce que Boudjedra a écrit auparavant, ne reproduit aucun ne s'écrit.

Le texte se compose de 69 fragments, qui représentent l'alternance de prises de parole des douze narrateurs, réparties tel qu'il suit : Raï-9, Jeanne-9, Jean-8, Kader-4, Nabila-6, Kamel-5, Yasmina-5, Mîr-7, Sidi Mohammed-5, Leïla-3, Hamid-3, Zigo-5. Chaque fragment à l'exception des trois derniers, a des dimensions presque égales (trois pages maximum), comme si l'auteur s'était imposé une sorte de contrainte oulipienne d'écriture. En outre, ce dispositif assure un rythme constant et confère du dynamisme à la progression du récit.

« C'est qui m'intrigue, maintenant que je vais mourir, c'est que ma période algérienne est un mélange de bonheur très grand et de malheur terrible. Il me faudrait en faire la synthèse pour mourir libéré de toutes les faras de l'histoire qui a pourri ma vie. Après tout, est-ce que j'ai vérifié chaque jour un peu plus depuis que ça m'est venu en tête dans mon sommeil, vraiment ? Le but de la vie est de se préparer à la mort ». Et c'est ce que j'ai fait, sans vraiment le savoir. La période algérienne m'a permis de vérifier cette formule. Peut-être que j'étais déjà mort avant de devenir un fabricant de cerceaux à la chaîne. La moisissure était déjà en moi. Elle est déjà en nous. (HSG, p. 253)

En ce qui concerne la dernière intervention de Jeanne, « Puis, plus rien... » (HSG, p. 259), tel le cas es en accord avec une affirmation antérieure de Raï : « Derrière Jeanne, il y avait l'insupportable souffrance de son père Jean. Il y avait la douleur et le malheur du monde. Derrière Jeanne, il y avait le vide aussi. » (HSG, p. 139) Si cette phrase clôture du point de vue formel le récit elle est en même temps une plongée dans le vide, qui l'ouvre vers l'indefini et vers l'infini, mais qui souligne aussi la difficulté d'un « après » existentiel et narratif.

D'ailleurs, les soixante-neuf fragments qui composent le récit et ses formes ouvertes, qui ne font que renforcer l'impression de s'égarer dans une réalité plurielle, ou l'impossibilité de saisir et de figer les sens des existences et des confessions multipliées. Chaque fragment est une confession inachevée, une sorte d'île exotique, qui participe à la construction archipélique du récit.

L'une des clés de lecture de ce texte est la construction paradoxale du roman, très bien délimitée formellement mais aussi ouverte sémantiquement et présente dans le texte même :

[...] lorsqu'elle [Mîr] me demandait de reprendre le récit que j'avais abandonné la veille au milieu d'une phrase, je ne me faisais pas trop prier, heureux d'avoir été appelé au traquenard et réalisé le miracle de ma propre négation et de ma propre fuite devant moi-même (« C'est la peur de la lâcheté, de la déshonneur et de la fragmentation es idiote », disai-elle). (HSG, p. 173)

Le fait que la plupart des fragments finissent sur une phrase suspendue, sur une parole inachevée, sur une interrogation : « Seulement... » (HSG, p. 127) ; « Et je me mis à lui parler de Noureddine, mon cousin aïto... » (HSG, p. 91) ; « Ratsai il vraiment que je suis un... » (HSG, p. 65) ; « J'allais mourir en emportant avec moi une énigme insoluble : Pourquoi les hommes sont-ils si cruels ? » (HSG, p. 131) a, par conséquent, une double signification : d'une part, il est le reflet des angoisses, de l'impuissance, de la permanente remise en question d'un écrivain confronté à soi-même et à son texte pendant le processus d'écriture. D'autre part, ce type de fragmentation épouse le rythme de la pensée de chaque personnage, souligne sa propre fragmentation, sa déchirure intérieure, son incapacité à se dire entièrement.

Une pensée suspendue, interrompue, ce type d'incapacité physique et morale d'aller parfois plus loin dans la confession est aussi soutenue par une autre évidence de l'écriture de ce roman : dynamique, satirique, elle ne repose pas seulement sur la force de signification des phrases courtes, elliptiques, mais sur la force des mots, qui constituent souvent l'essentiel du dialogue du non-dit. Les mots, nous dirions, l'unicité fondamentale de signification de ce récit et il est à la fois puissant, dominant, explosif, constituent l'essence du sens. À de nombreux endroits du texte, une caractéristique, une sensation, un état d'âme sont décrits par un mot isolé, ou par des suites de mots isolés, figés dans leur isolement au sein du fragment généralement par des points. De cette manière, par moments, le récit progresse plus abruptement mais l'effet sur le lecteur est maximal : la fluidité du flux de lecture est affectée, mais le lecteur est obligé de s'arrêter davantage sur le mot isolé, d'y réfléchir, de subir pleinement son impact émotionnel : « J'étais abasourdie. Liquéfiée. Presque morte. » (HSG, p. 75) ; « J'ai eu une enfance tranquille. Silencieuse. Feuillée. Triste. Morte, quoi ! » (HSG, p. 12).

Le Rat, il dit à moi Bonjour. Je pensé qui lui ? Gueule de bognol. Lui rizar. Moi rien. Piazza di Ezze. Li dimonche. Gaouris faire prière à la mosquée des gaouris. Païffer ia. Gaouri gros. Mange baïoup baïoup. Boire baïoup baïoup. Gaouri manger port ! Pas Kader. Fa freddo. Moi triste. Rien faisé. Rien diser. Rien voir. (HSG, p. 110)

Derrière des fragments qui composent le récit et son lien à leur tour, illustratifs pour l'écriture fragmentaire : des extraits de chroniques, des citations, des slogans publicitaires se mêlent parfois aux confessions des personnages, dans un jeu intellectuel et de mise en abîme désabilisant. Par exemple, le texte attribué à l'inconnue qui aide Kader à son arrivée en France, est en réalité l'intitule de Topographie idéale pour une agression caractérisée, autre roman célèbre de Rachid Boudjedra, qui lui a été du drame des immigrants maghrébins. Comme dans de nombreux autres passages de son récit, Boudjedra provoque son lecteur, en faisant appel à ses compétences encyclopédiques.

Une qui surprend dans la construction du récit est le bouleversement de la chronologie. Si le repère temporel majeur est la guerre de libération de l'Algérie, à laquelle se rapportent la plupart des personnages, pour le reste des événements évoqués il n'y a pas de repère contraire. Le récit ne propose que des approximations : temps de « l'absence de temps », le temps de l'écriture fragmentaire échappe à toute appréhension ; un présent sans présent, un passé plus présent que le présent lui-même, un futur mais alors sans avenir, appartenant déjà au passé » (Hoppeno 2001).

Une temporalité encore plus déroutante est donnée que de certaines interventions sont placées dans le récit après la mort des personnages : à la page 123 du roman, on peut lire : « Hamid est mort, Kamel est mort, Yasmina est morte ». Par la suite, les trois personnages prennent encore la parole. Cette temporalité trouble nous au point aussi de penser que la place des confessions dans le récit est incontestablement, à quelques exceptions près, les mêmes fragments qui pourraient être réorganisés selon d'autres schémas, de même qu'il n'est pas évident que si l'ouverture de l'œuvre est de l'impossible figement du sens ou de la structure romanesque.

Une autre clé de l'écriture et de la lecture du roman est dévoilée par Rachid Boudjedra dans l'une de ses interviews déjà mentionnées, « Rachid Boudjedra : le bruit, la fureur et la compassion » :

Le texte est en effet polyphonique, en l'écrivant, je pensais à « La symphonie des mille » de Mahler, symphonie que Mahler considérait comme sa plus grande œuvre et qui a entraîné son suicide. C'est ce qui inspire à Visconti son superbe film, « Morlaà Venise ». Pendant que j'écrivais, j'étais assis devant la symphonie en bouillie. (op. cit.)

Il est évident que ce texte est aussi profondément marqué par l'écriture du roman, car les confessions des personnages passent en bouillie. Ce procédé de répétition favorise les variations et la multiplication des points de vue sur un événement ou sur un personnage. De cette manière, par le retour de chacun des intervenants sur un événement ou sur le caractère ou sur ses rapports avec sa famille, ceux-ci prennent forme et se présentent par des couches successives, qui leur donnent de l'épaisseur, et par des éclairages multiples qui les surprennent sous toutes leurs faces et dans toute leur complexité. Une fois de plus, la multiplication et la relativisation des points de vue, rend impossible le figement du sens/d'un sens unique. Par exemple, le geste de Kamel de piétiner le cadavre d'un père trop peu présent dans sa vie et qui le trahit une dernière fois en transgressant les lois de la jurisprudence musulmane, Hamid ne le favorise pas en lui léguant son patrimoine par ses biens à sa femme et à sa fille, ce qui entraîne le geste abominable du fils. Le retour de la plupart des intervenants sur cet épisode, l'amplifie jusqu'à la limite du supportable. Pareillement l'évocation des horreurs auxquelles Kader avait soumis ses victimes pendant des séances de torture, ou bien au paroxysme. Mais, au-delà de la violence, de la souffrance, de l'obsession, de la folie, Rachid Boudjedra suggère sinon la possibilité de réconciliation, au moins la possibilité de comprendre l'abominable et l'impardonnable, afin de les exorciser et de continuer à vivre, même avec le poids de ne jamais pouvoir changer quelque chose à la cruauté humaine ou aux horreurs de l'histoire.

Conclusions

Le retour au fragment comme forme-texte dans Hôtel Saint-Georges a conduit Rachid Boudjedra à un véritable exploit stylistique : forme – paradoxalement dans ce cas – (presque) fixe (du point de vue de ses dimensions formelles) et à la fois ouverte, le fragment a été le choix le plus judicieux pour la mise en place d'une narration polyphonique, pour faire entendre les voix de douze narrateurs et de leur perméabilité de se relayer de manière dynamique.

En se contentant d'inscrire sur une écriture fragmentaire elliptique, l'écrivain a éliminé tous les éléments superflus du texte, articulé l'acte de manière efficace : histoire individuelle et histoire collective, dans un univers narratif sensible et violemment trouble et provocateur. Le fragment s'est aussi imposé comme la formule la plus heureuse de l'écriture de la mémoire qui, souvent ne peut se reconstituer que sur le mode du fragmentaire, et de l'écriture de la variation, de l'inachevé, de la construction d'un sujet pluriel.

La seule question qui persiste dans notre mémoire, à la fin de ce parcours analytique, est la peur de la littérature, de la déshirure, de la fragmentation de l'individu peut-être surmontée par l'écriture et par la parole, ou seulement exhibée.

ABSTRACT: Psychological analysis of traditional childbirth in Adamawa and East Cameroon

After 38 weeks covering the period of gestation, the foetus must come into a world that is completely different from the intra-uterine environment in which he lived. The environment that the newborn must be secure to facilitate its transition, its survival in turn is full quality development. Choices related to health care will observe pregnancies are analyzed by Bee and Boyd (2008). They also guide the place of birth. Despite the actions of the State and certain international organizations (UNICEF) in some areas of our country on parental education, traditional childbirth remains the best choice for many parents. We analyze its impact on the newborn and even its future development by relying on theories of developmental psychology. The study aims to analyze this form of giving birth by the profane, qualitative method. This involves collecting data from practitioners and mothers who are describing and explaining the rituals of traditional childbirth. It appears that the choice of this form of giving birth is justified by the inaccessibility of a hospital, economic reasons, the culture, but also by the social representations related to the hospital. When giving birth does not present any complication, the newborn has a chance to survive despite an environment that remains insecure, but he is receiving no consideration to assess his future physical and mental condition.

Introduction

L'accouchement est l'événement qui marque la transition entre le milieu intra-utérin et l'environnement où se passera toute la vie de l'individu. L'objectif de cette étude est de faire un examen et une analyse psychologique de l'accouchement dans un contexte traditionnel.

Depuis des siècles et même au XXI^e siècle où nous nous situons, les conséquences sur la mère et le futur enfant sont nombreuses lorsqu'il n'y pas un bon choix du spécialiste qui assiste la femme enceinte et pendant l'accouchement et des ainsi que le problème de mortalité périnatale et maternelle reste d'actualité. Plusieurs mesures sont prises par les États pour résoudre le problème. Au Cameroun, le gouvernement a soutenu plusieurs engagements cliniques pour atteindre les Objectifs du Millénaire pour le Développement no 4 et 5 dont l'accroissement et l'amélioration de la couverture géographique de l'offre de soins périnataux en 2010 de la région de l'Adrar pour l'Association de la République démocratique et populaire algérienne en Afrique (AIRMMA) dans le cadre du programme santé de la reproduction de la stratégie sectorielle de la santé 2001-2015. Autres mesures prises pour renforcer la subvention et la gratuité de plusieurs composantes de la soins périnataux tels que le dépistage du VIH-SIDA, le vaccin antitétanique, les antitétaniques, la supplémentation en vitamine A, le traitement préventif du paludisme, la distribution des moustiquaires imprégnées, le renforcement de l'offre des soins obstétricaux et néonataux d'urgence avec notamment des kits de Césarienne.

Cependant, les statistiques de 2009 et 2010 révèlent que, si 83,3% à 85% des parturientes ont effectué en moyenne une visite prénatale, 60% en ont eu quatre et seulement 35% celle du premier trimestre. La recommandation de l'OMS est normalement de 4 consultations avant l'accouchement pour réduire la mortalité infantile et néonatale. Les rapports de l'INS (2011), du MINSANTE (2011a ; 2011b) et de World Bank (2011) présentent 1000 décès pour 100 000 naissances au Maroc. Or, la région de l'Adrar a des avantages notamment la sensibilisation sur les signes d'alerte et de danger, la détection et le traitement précoce des situations à risque et l'amélioration du recours à l'aide appropriée lors de l'accouchement (Prual et al., 2002 ; Ndiaye et al., 2005 ; Mbuagbaw & Gofin, 2010). L'estimation des besoins non satisfaits de la région de l'Adrar est supérieure à 40% dans les régions de l'Est, du Nord-ouest et de l'Ouest et du Sud. Il existe une proportion significative de femmes échappant à toute soins périnataux dans toutes les régions avec cependant une plus forte concentration dans le Centre, l'Extrême-nord, le Littoral, l'Adamaoua, le Nord-ouest et l'Ouest et le Sud-ouest. La moitié des femmes accèdent à la région de l'Adrar dans des formations sanitaires informelles ou chez des accoucheuses traditionnelles (Minsanté, 2011a ; 2011b). Par ailleurs, les rapports des enquêtes menées par Bonono et Ongolo-Zogo (2012), Zogo (2011) sont un cri d'alarme pour 306 femmes attendues chaque année au Maroc ainsi que les familles de 4 500 femmes qui décèdent chaque année des suites de complications. La réduction des décès sur ce phénomène est de mise.

1. État de la question

Les recherches sur la parentalité ont été abordées en mettant en relation les facteurs tels que la fécondité et le niveau socio-économique de la femme. Des études historiques et culturelles mettent en évidence sur l'espace et des naissances, le rang et le sexe du nouveau-né. D'autres études démontrent le rôle de l'accouchement et des rituels réservés aux premiers moments de vie du nouveau-né. Dans cette partie, nous présentons quelques-unes, afin de montrer la pertinence de l'étude.

La plupart des études dans les pays en voie de développement dans la seconde moitié du XX^e siècle mettent en évidence sur la corrélation entre les données socio-démographiques et la mortalité, et plus spécifiquement entre le niveau d'instruction et la fécondité. La corrélation inverse entre le niveau d'instruction et la fécondité des femmes est l'une des découvertes les plus remarquables et les plus solides de la recherche en sciences sociales de la deuxième moitié de ce siècle (Basu et Aaby, 1998 ;

Mole (1976) avait décrit les rites liés à l'accouchement traditionnel à Madagascar où la femme était appelée à accoucher sans crier et était lavée et soignée par un nouveau-né enfermé dans une pièce qui ne pouvait s'ouvrir pendant huit jours, périodes où il y a d'autres rites pour la sortie de l'enfant et de la nouvelle accouchée. L'auteur n'aborde pas l'influence de cette pratique sur le développement de l'enfant.

En revanche, les études historiques et culturelles ont abordé la problématique de la parentalité en mentionnant l'attention sur d'autres facteurs comme l'espace et de naissance, la composition par sexe, etc. (Delaunay, 1994 ; Herlihy, 1996 ; Johnson-Hanks, 2002).

La situation vécue au Sénégal est aussi décrite au Sénégal. L'enquête menée par Almamy Malick Kané et Gilles Pison (2010) sur le recours aux soins à Bandafassi en 2007 au Sud-Est du Sénégal révèle que le taux de mortalité maternelle est de 911 décès pour 100 000 naissances vivantes en moyenne au cours de la période 1976-2006. Durant leur grossesse, 17% des femmes n'ont consulté aucun personnel de santé. Il est à noter que près de 10% des femmes ayant consulté un personnel de santé ont effectué en parallèle une consultation chez le guérisseur. Pour le lieu d'accouchement, les résultats de leur recherche montrent que parmi les 239 femmes interrogées en 2007, 86 % ont accouché à domicile (dans la consultation, les camps, etc.), contre 14 % en maternité.

Des auteurs ont aussi examiné l'influence de la construction d'un hôpital moderne au cœur d'une zone rurale du Sénégal mal équipée jusqu'alors, la zone de Bandafassi, et dont l'objectif était de faire reculer la mortalité maternelle, très élevée, en offrant des soins de haut niveau notamment obstétrique. De leurs recherches, il ressort que quatre ans après son ouverture, il n'y pas eu d'évolution sur les comportements des populations. Pour eux, l'offre en soins de santé en quantité et en qualité, n'est pas un facteur suffisant pour améliorer la santé des populations. Chez les Sereer du Sénégal par exemple, « l'accouchement est une étape initiatrice de la vie de la femme qui se doit d'enfanter seule et en silence. Un espritisme ébranle la condition pour passer honorablement du statut d'épouse à celui de mère ».

D'après les études menées par Dandelle et Lotoh (1990) en Afrique Subsaharienne, la tradition est d'accoucher à domicile. Chez les Peuls de la région du Fouta Djallon, en Guinée, les accouchements ont lieu à domicile, sans aucune assistance, « la coutume laissant la femme seule avec Dieu » (Dandelle et al., 1992). Des études évoquent le ton exotique traditionnel d'athouchemen, sans montrer son impact sur le nouveau-né.

Aubaile-Sallenave (1997), décrit les premières périodes de vie de l'enfant avec l'entrée en jeu des pratiques rituelles complexes qui demeurent vivantes dans les sociétés traditionnelles et pense que, les premiers jours de vie du petit enfant maghrébin sont riches d'expériences multiples en éveil ses sens olfactif, gustatif, auditif, et dans une moindre mesure visuel et tactile.

Fellous (1981 & 202) s'est intéressé à la socialisation de l'enfant en milieu traditionnel Bambara. Chaque étape du développement social de l'enfant est soignée. Il existe donc un lien entre l'âge, l'éducation et la socialisation. Les rituels concernent ainsi la naissance, la circoncision, l'excision et le mariage.

Pour Dumas & Hampion (2002), l'enfant dans la société Masa (Tchad) reçoit toute l'affection et la valeur selon son sexe, sa nature ou son rang dans la fratrie. Le premier né par exemple est celui qui donne une place à sa mère car c'est par sa naissance qu'elle bénéficie de son intégration sociale au sein de sa belle famille. Les rituels sont pratiqués sur les naissances gemellaires par les enfants moins pubères, malheureusement l'auteur ne nous en décrit pas le contenu, mais le but est d'éloigner le risque de mort qui pèse sur ces enfants.

Sénégal (1973) fait la critique de la place attribuée à la pédiatrie dans les pays du tiers monde. Pour l'auteur, la spécialisation est consacrée à la population qui se situe entre 0-15 ans et prétend que la vie ne commence pas avec la naissance et aussi la croissance n'est pas achevée à 15 ans et le paradoxe est que c'est cette population qu'on retrouve dans les statistiques de la morbidité et de la mortalité. Des événements survenant lors de la grossesse peuvent avoir des conséquences irréversibles sur le devenir de l'enfant à la période post-natale. L'auteur relève la période avant 6 ans comme celle de vulnérabilité infantile, où il y a un fort taux de décès dans les pays du tiers monde car, sur 1000 naissances, 150-300 meurent avant l'âge d'un an. Cette situation est déterminée par le ton exotique d'athouchemen dont aucune étude aborde.

2. Insertion théorique

La théorie que nous utilisons pour expliquer le problème que soulève cette étude est celle des fonctions parentales. Elles définissent les rôles parentaux dans les tâches quotidiennes. Les tâches maternelles et paternelles englobent toute ce que les parents doivent contrôler et apporter à l'enfant tout au long de son développement. La conception d'un enfant est un projet commun des parents. Aussi, les théoriciens du développement de l'enfant décrivent le ton exotique d'athouchemen et ses stades et l'évaluation du nouveau-né qui nous intéresse.

Pendant la période prénatale, le milieu intra-utérin où se développe le fœtus doit être sain pour éviter des conséquences futures irréversibles et favoriser son bon développement intégral. La mère doit donc être en bonne santé, avoir une alimentation appropriée et éviter la consommation des substances toxiques. Elle doit aussi contrôler des agents tératogènes qui sont néfastes pour le fœtus. Ceci demande par conséquent pendant le stade du projet de parentalité et au cours de l'étape de gestion, la mère fait un choix d'un personnel spécialisé. C'est ce dernier qui va la suivre pendant toute cette période et qui va l'assister au moment de l'accouchement dans un milieu obscur.

Un autre aspect de la fonction parentale est la conséquence de celle décrite et consistant à donner la vie au fœtus. En effet, une peinture avait été faite de l'accouchement à domicile dans l'ancienne France du XVIII^e siècle par Rieu (1991). Plusieurs accouchées à domicile étaient surprises en activités qu'elles ne pouvaient pas interrompre pour éviter un déséquilibre économique dans le ménage. Au cours de ces activités domestiques, elles subissaient une douleur qui provoquait l'accouchement et des travaux rudes répétés pouvaient déclencher un accouchement désastreux. L'auteur évoque également le drame des accouchements solitaires non ordinaires qui ont été un champ de recherche abondant pour les médecins, juristes, etc., et qui sont en effet des cas pathologiques. Ici, la grossesse est dissimulée jusqu'au moment où l'heure d'accouchement survient et la femme accouche et se retire à s'isoler pour faire disparaître les traces après.

Pour autant, le don de la vie favorise l'inscription de l'enfant dans l'arbre généalogique. Poussin (2004) voit dans ces fonctions une addition ou encore une complémentarité entre la maternité et la paternité. Il relève l'importance de la fonction parentale et déclare que « rien ne remplace quelqu'un qui remplit correctement la fonction parentale » (2004:131). Lorsqu'elles sont assumées sans défaillance, elles se caractérisent pendant la période prénatale et néonatale par la prise en charge de la grossesse, le respect des quatre consultations, le choix d'accouchement dans un cadre obscur, le contrôle de son état émotionnel, etc. Mais, lorsque des distorsions surviennent dans l'exercice des fonctions parentales à cette période, des conséquences sont les suivantes : absence de bilan sur l'état de l'enfant à la naissance, mortalité périnatale, malformations, morbidité infantile ou vulnérabilité.

Les théoriciens de la psychologie du développement ont abordé des choix qui s'offrent liés à l'accouchement. Il peut ainsi avoir lieu dans un centre hospitalier avec un médecin généraliste ou obscurien, ou une sage-femme. Il doit y avoir des chances de naissance qui offrent un déroulement heureux pour le travail et l'accouchement avec la participation des membres de la famille. Il y a aussi la possibilité que cela se passe à domicile mais en présence d'une sage-femme. Les cas sont « 1% actuellement en Amérique du Nord » (Bec & Boyd, 2008 : 58). Pour l'âge plus élevé en Europe où l'on considère que l'accouchement à domicile reste naturel, plus sûr et moins coûteux. Par ailleurs, les ménages sont affiliés à des hôpitaux pour favoriser le transfert rapide en cas de complication. Cependant, dans ce contexte, cette forme d'accouchement n'est autorisée que pour des cas de femmes qui ont reçu des soins prénataux de qualité et des grossesses sans complication car le centre hospitalier offre plus de sécurité. En 2005, le gouvernement du Québec a adopté un règlement sur les normes de pratiques et les conditions d'exercice d'un accouchement à domicile. La maison de naissance assure le suivi complet d'une femme enceinte qui continue les soins prénataux, lors de l'accouchement et des soins post-nataux.

Trois étapes de l'accouchement sont décrites. La première qui est celle du travail avec une durée variable de 3-20 heures est longue pour un accouchement avec anamnèse et pour les primipares. Elle comprend trois sous-étapes : la première est celle de la lente avec des contractions utérines espacées et peu douloureuses, avec effacement du col de l'utérus et sa dilatation à 10 cm, la seconde diéc active avec la dilatation du col à 3-4 cm et se poursuit jusqu'à ce qu'elle atteigne 8 cm, se caractérise par le rapprochement et l'intensification des contractions, le fœtus descend progressivement; et la dernière, diéc de transition, est celle de la dilatation des deux derniers centimètres, est la plus courte mais aussi la plus pénible de la femme, avec des contractions très rapprochées et très intenses. La deuxième phase est celle de l'expulsion du fœtus quand le col est complètement dilaté, 10 cm et se termine avec la naissance de l'enfant. L'attouchée s'ordonne en urgence à pousser au cas où l'aneshésie entrave l'envie de le faire; les problèmes liés à ce stade sont ceux de la présence du siège qui peut causer la détresse fœtale, aussi la compression du cordon entre le col utérin et la tête du bébé, supprimant ou réduisant l'apport du sang maternel vers le bébé dont de l'oxygène au fœtus. Une anoxie qui peut endommager le cerveau du fœtus et même entraîner la mort. Une autre catégorie d'attouchée anormale est celle diéc par césarienne. La dernière phase de cette étape dure moins d'une heure et rarement plus de deux heures. À 80% des cas, il y a le retour à l'épisiotomie (incision du périnée) pour faciliter l'attachement. Le nouveau-né lavé et posé sur le ventre de sa mère ou confié à son père. La dernière étape est celle de l'expulsion du placenta et des autres tissus provenant de l'utérus afin d'éviter les risques d'hémorragie.

Le bébé expulsé doit faire l'objet d'une évaluation. L'indice d'Apgar est utilisé pour son état physique selon cinq critères: la fréquence cardiaque, la respiration, le tonus musculaire, la réponse aux stimuli et la couleur de la peau selon une échelle d'évaluation comprise entre 1 et 3 points (Bee & Boyd, 2008). L'enfant se porte bien lorsque le résultat de l'examen donne au moins 7 points, entre 4-6, il a besoin d'assistance, entre 1-3, il est dans un état critique. L'échelle de Brazelton permet aussi de mesurer le comportement néonatal 30 mn après son expulsion. Elle concerne les réflexes, les capacités d'interaction, les capacités motrices et physiologiques, les réactions aux stress, ainsi que la capacité de maintenir un état calme et de se mettre en alerte. Leur but est de détecter les troubles neurologiques.

L'évaluation concerne aussi le poids de l'enfant qui peut être affecté par des agents tératogènes. Dès que l'enfant pèse moins de 2 500 grammes à la naissance, il a déjà un faible poids, moins de 1 500 grammes, c'est un très faible poids et moins de 1 000 grammes, ce sont des cas extrêmes. Aussi, des nouveau-nés prématurément peuvent présenter un faible poids. Les conséquences du faible poids à la naissance sont plus faible réactivité à la naissance et dans les premiers mois de vie, développement plus lent et troubles respiratoires. À long terme, en l'absence d'une meilleure prise en charge des besoins de l'enfant par les parents, des conséquences peuvent s'observer sur le plan cognitif avec des difficultés d'attention et d'apprentissage.

3. Méthodologie

La partie méthodologique de cette recherche s'articule autour de la question qui guide l'étude, de la méthode, du site et des résultats.

3.1. Questions de recherche

L'objectif que nous poursuivons à travers de cette étude consiste à examiner et analyser l'influence sur le nouveau-né de l'accouchement dans un contexte traditionnel. Pour atteindre la question principale qui nous guide est la suivante : comment la pratique de l'accouchement dans un contexte traditionnel peut avoir une influence sur le nouveau-né ? Pour mieux comprendre, nous l'avons élargie en plusieurs : Qui pratique l'accouchement traditionnel ? Où se pratique-t-il ? Quel est le matériel utilisé pendant l'accouchement et pour l'évaluation du bébé ? Quelles en sont les conséquences ? Pour apporter des éléments de réponse, nous avons utilisé une méthode que nous présentons par la suite.

3.2. Méthode de recherche

La méthode qualitative, profane, de type descriptif et explicatif est celle que nous avons utilisée pour avoir les résultats de l'étude. Son usage se justifie par le fait que l'objet d'étude est un phénomène de résistance, de culture (Muthielli, 2009 ; Deslauriers, 1988 ; 1991). Les données ont été recueillies grâce aux entretiens qui ont nécessité l'élaboration des guides d'entretien. Deux guides ont été élaborées dont un est destiné aux praticiens et l'autre aux accouchées. Les résultats ont été analysés grâce à la technique d'analyse de contenu. Pour y parvenir, une grille d'analyse inspirée de l'indice d'Appar et du contenu d'un accouchement théorisé par les psychologues du développement a été élaborée. C'est elle qui a donné les résultats que nous allons présenter.

3.3. Sites de l'étude

L'étude a eu lieu dans la Région de l'Adamaoua, particulièrement dans le Département de la Vina, Arrondissement de Ngaoundéré deuxième ; et dans la Région de l'Est, Département du Haut-Nyong, Arrondissement de Dimako, deux localités du Cameroun. La première région est frontalière du Nigeria à l'Ouest de la République centrafricaine à l'Est. Elle est la troisième par sa taille avec une zone montagneuse qui délimite le Cameroun forestier du Sud et la savane du Nord. Ngaoundéré est son chef-lieu de la Région et du département de la Vina. Ses autres départements sont le Djérem, le Faro, le Déo, le Mayo-Banyo et le Mbéré. L'islam est la principale religion et les peuls constituent la principale ethnie qui a éouffé les ethnies locales qui ont presque perdu leur culture, leur identité. Sa population est de 1 080 500 habitants avec une superficie de 63 701 km². Le taux d'analphabétisme reste encore un problème important dans cette région et concerne la population comprise entre 15-25 ans (32,42% pour les hommes et 66,69% pour les femmes). La culture et la religion guident de manière importante les comportements de la population. Les accouchées traditionnelles et les femmes accouchées interrogées sont toutes de la Vina.

La région de l'Est s'étend à elle située au Sud-Est du pays, avec pour chef-lieu Beroua. D'autres régions limitrophes sont celles du Centre, du Sud et de l'Adamaoua. Ses départements sont Boumba-et-Guigo, Haut-Nyong, Kadey et Lom-et-Djérem.

Ndjerem. Sa population est de 755 100 habitants avec une superficie de 109 011 km². L'étude a eu lieu dans le Haut-Nyong, plus particulièrement dans l'Arrondissement de Dimako. La forêt de type équatoriale qui couvre la région influence de manière archaïque les activités et les comportements des populations.

3.4. Population et échantillon de l'étude

L'étude s'adresse à toutes les femmes accouchées traditionnellement et celles qui exercent cette forme d'accouchement. En revanche, la technique d'échantillonnage boule de neige est celle que nous avons utilisée. Le Chef du quartier communément appelé Djaoro dans l'Adamaoua, nous autorisa à accéder dans la concession pour nous mettre en contact avec des femmes accouchées traditionnellement et un autre guide nous conduisit chez les praticiennes. Grâce à cette technique, nous avons pu rencontrer deux praticiennes dans chaque site et la saturation des données du premier site nous a imposée la limitation de l'échantillon à quatre femmes accouchées.

4. Présentation et analyse des données

La présentation des résultats s'articule autour des données anamnestiques des praticiennes et des accouchées d'une part, de la description du contexte d'accouchement traditionnel d'autre part.

4.1. Données anamnestiques des participants

Elles concernent d'un côté les accoucheuses traditionnelles et de l'autre les femmes accouchées.

4.1.1. Données anamnestiques accoucheuses traditionnelles

Quatre accoucheuses traditionnelles ont été identifiées dont deux qui sont en situation de monoparentalité suite au décès de son conjoint pour l'une, et suite au choix personnel pour l'autre notamment à l'Es. Deux sont mariées sous le régime polygamique dans l'Adamaoua. Elles sont respectivement âgées de 43, 48, 51 et 55 ans. Elles ont des points communs, car elles sont toutes ménagères avec absence de scolarisation. Elles ont toutes accouché traditionnellement et la pratique de l'accouchement a été transmise par leur mère pour deux, et acquise suite à l'expérience personnelle pour les deux autres. Elles sont mères de 6, 8, 8 et 9 enfants respectivement.

4.1.2. Données anamnestiques des accouchées

Nous avons un échantillon de huit accouchées traditionnellement avec des caractéristiques ainsi présentées dans le tableau.

Tableau descriptif des accouchées traditionnelles

Accouchées	Âge	Situation familiale	Niveau scolaire	Nombre d'enfants
Sujet 1	16	Célibataire	Absente de scolarisation	1
Sujet 2	19	Concubinage	secondaire	2
Sujet 3	16	Célibataire	primaire	1
Sujet 4	35	Mariée-polygamie	Absente de scolarisation	4
Sujet 5	18	Célibataire	secondaire	1
Sujet 6	25	Célibataire	primaire	3
Sujet 7	19	Concubinage	secondaire	2
Sujet 8	19	Mariée-polygamie	primaire	1

La lecture de ce tableau montre que les primipares sont plus nombreuses, soit la moitié de l'échantillon, et sont également les plus jeunes, 16, 18 ans. Et qui peuvent justifier leur immaturité dans la prise de décision quant au lieu d'accouchement, doublée des difficultés économiques et de l'influence culturelle.

4.2. Contexte d'accouchement traditionnel

Les résultats que nous présentons décrivent le lieu d'accouchement et le matériel utilisé, l'évaluation du nouveau-né et les soins dont il bénéficie, selon l'indice d'Appgar.

Il ressort du contenu des discours des participantes que l'accouchement traditionnel pour les deux sites de cette étude se réalise dans une cuisine, une chambre ou au pied d'un arbre. Le matériel utilisé est composé du whisky traditionnel appelé « arki » qui joue le rôle de stérilisateur, la lame rasoir pour couper le cordon ombilical mesuré à l'aide du doigt (l'auriculaire), le fil à tresser, un petit plateau en cas d'absence d'une lame, une natte, le pain et le miel pour atténuer les étapes du travail.

Concernant l'évaluation du nouveau-né, il ressort des contenus des entretiens que les fréquences cardiaques ne sont pas évaluées, aussi, la maîtrise de qualité de la respiration est ignorée, ainsi que la méthode de sa stimulation lorsqu'elle est retardée. Le tonus musculaire n'est pas aussi évalué car les attitudes ne décrivent aucune méthode, et les réponses aux stimulations ne sont pas observées. Cependant, la couleur de la peau est observée.

Les soins apportés au nouveau-né sont la scission du cordon ombilical, nettoyage à l'aide du baignoire, bain dans une eau préparée avec les matières végétales, habillage 7 jours avant sa sortie pour certains, 40 jours pour d'autres.

5. Interprétation des résultats

Les résultats présentés montrent qu'il y a immaturité chez la majorité des accouchées ainsi que les difficultés économiques qui justifient le choix pour cette forme d'accouchement. La non prise en compte des besoins du nouveau-né, la transition brutale entre le milieu intra-utérin et celui extra-utérin, le contexte d'accouchement non sé-

Curisan, ainsi que les difficultés de son évaluation peuvent avoir un impact irréversible sur son développement à venir et jusque dans la défaillance parentale. Des cas qui peuvent être à l'origine de nombreux cas de décès néonataux.

6. Discussion

La précarité, la pauvreté, la culture jusque dans le choix pour l'accouchement traditionnel. Par ailleurs, les critiques vis-à-vis de la qualité des services en milieu hospitaliers sont des arguments qui œuvrent pour l'évolution de ces milieux par de nombreuses familles (Beninguise, 2003 ; Almamy Malick Kané & Gilles Pison, 2010). En outre, les statistiques liées à la mortalité néonatale, ne distinguent pas les cas des hôpitaux de ceux issus des accouchements traditionnels.

7. Conclusion

Cette étude avait pour objectif d'examiner et d'analyser l'accouchement dans un contexte particulier : traditionnel. L'indice d'Apgar décrit par les théoriciens du développement humain a été exploité pour analyser les contenus issus des entretiens avec les participantes. Il en ressort que le contexte d'accouchement traditionnel, bien que faisant partie des us dans certaines localités (Olovestu, 2010), présente des risques pour le développement futur du nouveau-né. Des pathologies pouvant être préventivement prises en charge ne sont pas détectées à cause du manque de matériel pour une évaluation et aussi de l'absence de compétence des accoucheuses traditionnelles. En revanche, il est opportun que des études interculturelles abordent la problématique du développement des enfants accouchés dans le contexte traditionnel.

ABSTRACT: About the concepts of culture and under-culture within the framework of the comparative study of the French and Romanian prison environments

The civil society is built around the values shared by all individuals, values constituting its culture. Beyond the common culture, we equally experience what we call under-culture: the under-culture of teenagers, the under-culture of violence or the under-culture of prison, the latter constituting our point of interest. As far as the liberty-depriving environment is concerned, the assimilation and adoption of these under-cultures mark a distancing of the individual towards the conducts and values accepted by the civil society and his approach towards values less known/accepted by the society. Discussing notions such as culture and under-culture enables the researcher to consider the detainees in a double perspective: subject-speaker and social actor at the same time. We consequently aim to confront the elements constituting the culture of the civil society in general and the elements constituting the under-culture of the prison, underlining at the same time the functions of the culture and those of the under-culture.

KEYWORDS: society/community, culture/under-culture, comparative approach, French-Romanian prison environment

I. Introduction

Dans cette contribution, nous nous proposons de thématiser le milieu de réclusion en tant qu'insitution de l'État et le discours carcéral en tant que discours institutionnel. Le démarrage scientifique part de l'observation du contexte¹ où les sujets-parlants détiennent même en pratique leur discours, donc dans ce que Goffman appelle « institutions totalitaires »² (1968 : 41), et du constat qu'il y a des éléments discursifs et extra discursifs qui rapprochent le discours du milieu de la prison du discours institutionnel. Visant la présence des milieux carcéraux distincts du point de vue de l'organisation et de la constitution de la population carcérale, cette étude traitera des points suivants :

- Considérations sur la notion d'institution ;
- Le discours carcéral, un discours institutionnel ;
- Les axes de la culture dans la société civile ;
- Les axes de la sous-culture carcérale dans la situation d'étude comparative des milieux de réclusion français et roumain ;

- Fonctions de la culture dans la société civile ;
- Fonctions de la sous-culture dans le milieu de réclusion.

II. Problématique et objectifs

En accordant une attention particulière aux références des disciplines comme la sociologie, la linguistique, la sociolinguistique et la psychologie sociale, le but de la présente étude est d'identifier des détails qui permettent une analyse du milieu de la prison dans une perspective interdisciplinaire. Cette recherche se focalise sur un aspect social et implique un regard multiple sur la communauté socio-discursive du milieu de réclusion des deux pays, la Roumanie et la France. L'enquête présentée ici vise la compréhension du fonctionnement du milieu de réclusion et l'évaluation de la capacité des sujets parlants à s'adapter à une culture d'un État étranger et à la sous-culture du milieu pénal, inconnues jusqu'au moment du changement de leur statut social. Dans cette optique, on développe les aspects suivants :

- le milieu de la prison est une microsociété qui se construit sur des principes et valeurs évoluant parallèlement avec ceux de la société commune, qui développe ses propres règles et qui définit son identité par l'affirmation d'une « contre légitimité linguistique » (Bourdieu, 1983 : 103) ;
- la prison est analysable sur plusieurs aspects : insitution de l'État, milieu de socialisation et de revalorisation de la personne instituée après le décalage de perception qui s'installe dans le mental de l'individu et les réalités du milieu commun, communauté socio-discursive et sociolinguistique ;
- le milieu de la prison est un milieu de rencontre des cultures locales, régionales et d'État et des sous-cultures caractérisées dans un contexte mono- et multilingue.

III. Méthode de travail

Pour avoir une méthode plus pertinente du point de vue sociolinguistique, on a dû reconsidérer la méthode de travail et faire appel à la biographie linguistique. Pour cela, le chercheur a conçu un questionnaire³ à questions ouvertes, moyen qui a permis aux répondants d'offrir des détails importants concernant la vie de prison. Le questionnaire proposé aux répondants contenait cinq parties qui se déroulent progressivement sur l'illustration du monde caractérial à partir de la personne instituée en tant qu'individu jusqu'aux relations que celui-ci développe dans le nouveau milieu :

- la présentation individuelle de la personne détenue ;
- le milieu de détention ;
- les collèges de détention⁴ ;
- les activités au sein de la prison ;
- les relations avec la famille/les amis.

Cette technique est applicable aux études empiriques et concerne la présentation autobiographique du sujet impliqué dans la recherche et la description des expériences linguistiques et culturelles que le délinquant vit dans une communauté mono-/multilingue, mono-/multiculturelle, plus précisément dans un cadre institutionnel privé de liberté et celui-ci agit également dans une certaine mesure son identité en tant qu'acteur social et aussi en tant que sujet parlant qui présente les situations de vie à l'aide du nouveau discours. La technique utilisée aide le chercheur à connaître la perception de son sujet sur lui-même/les collègues de détention/le personnel de la prison sur le milieu carcéral/la société civile.

IV. La prison en tant qu'institution

Notre recherche propose pour le début quelques précisions sur la notion d'institution. Au sens large, l'institution représente une forme d'organisation des rapports sociaux dont le fonctionnement s'appuie sur des normes imposées en fonction des particularités de chaque domaine d'activité. En s'identifiant à l'autorité donnée par des règlements arbitrairement établis, l'institution impose à la collectivité certaines normes comportementales et directives.

Ce sont des idées que l'on retrouve aussi dans la théorie de Dominique Maingueneau qui soutient que

Par « institution », on n'entendra pas seulement les structures exemplaires que sont l'armée ou l'Église, mais plus largement, tout dispositif qui délimite l'exercice de la fonction énonciative, le statut des énonciateurs comme celui des destinataires, les types de contenus que l'on peut et doit dire, les conditions et des énonciation légitimes pour un quelconquement

L'existence de l'individu dans une certaine institution permet à la fois la distinction entre deux statuts sociaux qu'il vit simultanément. Dans le cas de l'exercice d'une profession ou dans le cas d'un isolement imposé dans des périodes différentes de sa vie, si on parle d'une peine privative de liberté, cette dernière situation a comme conséquence la reconstruction de son identité. Dans ce cas, la mise en pratique du discours institutionnel liée à l'exercice d'une profession met le sujet parlant dans une position valorisante aux yeux des membres de la société civile, par conséquent des utilisateurs du discours commun. En opposition avec les institutions standardisées, la prison représente une institution de la déviance au niveau socio-discursif, où l'on enregistre ce que Lebrun appelle « perte de repères ».

En paraphrasant Pierre Bourdieu (1982) et suivant le sens qu'il donne à la notion d'institution, nous donnons une définition du milieu de réclusion en soutenant l'idée que ce dernier « est représenté linguistiquement et/ou langagièrement par les moyens permettant au sujet parlant-détenu de faire des représentations mentales⁵ sur lui-même, sur ses collègues de détention et de construire sa 'façade sociale' » (Goffman, 1973 : 30-33) et au niveau relationnel, par les autorités représentantes l'institution de la prison, celles-ci imposent une réalité sociale nouvelle à la personne privée de liberté.

V. Le discours carcéral, un discours institutionnel

Le traitement du discours de la prison en tant que discours institutionnel s'avère intéressant dans le changement de notre perspective sur l'analyse des représentations sociales⁶ et mentales des prisonniers. En analysant ces premières en tant que produit de la pensée collective, Mostoviti (1961) établit des liens entre les représentations sociales et trois référents sociodiscursifs : communication, (re)construction (du réel) et maîtrise de l'environnement. La production du discours commun met en évidence la liberté de création discursive des sujets-parlants membres de la société civile, créative qui a comme points de départ la diversité d'âge des interactants, leur inscription, la spontanéité de leurs réactions lors des interactions verbales et la variété des situations de communication. En opposition, la construction du discours institutionnel impose aux interactants un nombre limité de situations de communication et donc la mise en pratique est faite par des locuteurs uniformément inscrits. Il se caractérise par une diversité réduite d'énoncés ainsi que par une distribution limitée dans l'espace public. En suivant les opinions de Krieg-Planque (2009 : 65) on accepte que cet équilibre se manifeste pour ce qui est des éléments lexicaux par des phénomènes de formulations conventionnelles, [...] et de figement.

La communauté socio-discursive de la prison représente « une catégorie de locuteurs non homogène » (Guilbert 1973). Plus que dans un milieu institutionnel standard, les sujets-parlants existant dans l'inscription de la prison se trouvent à la limite d'un discours dont la mise en pratique est valorisante et/ou non valorisante selon l'historique personnel de chaque individu en tant que personne libre/déchu et selon les critères du milieu de résolution. Le discours du milieu carcéral est valorisant dans le cercle restreint de la communauté de la prison et dévalorisant en rapportant les sujets parlants formant la population de la société carcérale aux yeux des locuteurs appartenant à la société civile. Dans ce cas, de l'expression du savoir au sein du groupe social, le discours institutionnel est un discours autorisé. Suivant l'interprétation de Pierre Bourdieu (1975 : 183-190), lors de la manifestation du discours institutionnel, ce ne sont pas les mots qui s'imposent mais le contexte (le lieu et le but de l'interaction).

VI. Traits du discours carcéral en tant que discours institutionnel

- a. Le discours institutionnel est hiérarchisant et imposé de l'extérieur au sujet parlant par les coordonnées du nouveau contexte social. Il est donc lié à l'histoire de l'inscription qui existe en dehors de ses événements « locaux ». Le vouloir dire du locuteur se réalise non pas « avant tout dans le choix d'un genre du discours » (Bakhtine, 1984 : 284), mais après une négociation entre les manifestations discursives pré-institutionnelles dominantes jusqu'à un moment donné dans le répertoire du sujet parlant et les formes limitatives conventionnelles par la pratique collective du nouveau discours. On parle donc d'une évolution du discours du sujet parlant du vouloir dire vers le savoir dire.

b. Le discours institutionnel se caractérise par un aspect situationnel. En tant que discours se développant au tour des échanges oraux (interlocuteurs) écrits (monologues), le discours institutionnel impose au sujet parlant l'appropriation de la compétence situationnelle. Cette compétence se construit dans le processus d'adaptation du sujet parlant à la nouvelle situation de communication et en même temps, doit tenir compte de « L'identité des partenaires de l'échange, de la finalité de l'échange, du propos en jeu et des circonstances matérielles de l'échange. » (Baraudeau, 2000)⁸

VII. Les axes de la culture dans la société civile

Avant de nous concentrer sur l'énumération et l'explication des axes de la culture, nous pensons nécessaire un éclaircissement des notions de société et de communauté, vu les notions de culture et de sous-culture au tour desquelles notre étude se construit. La société se définit donc par un nombre très élevé d'individus, dont les relations sont impersonnelles, conventionnelles et conventionnelles. Dans la société, le statut de l'individu est acquis. Par contre, la communauté se remarque par un nombre moins élevé d'individu en ce lesquels les relations se développent affectivement et à partir des us et des coutumes connus et cette plus par tous les membres. Ces us et coutumes ont un caractère normatif. Au sein de la communauté, le statut de l'individu est attribué.

La notion de culture comporte deux définitions de définition suivant les théories de Edward Taylor, on prend en considération tous les éléments constitutifs de la culture « matérielle et spirituelle, éthique ou institutionnelle, qui organise et réglemente la vie sociale »⁹. À ce « tout complexe », comme le nomme Taylor (se référant à la connaissance, foi, art, morale, loi, coutume, habitudes, aptitudes) s'ajoute, aux débuts 2-3 du XX^e siècle la composition linguistique et la communication, en général, les représentations, les idéologies (d'après Edward Sapir).¹⁰

Pour nous faire une idée sur le fonctionnement de la communauté culturelle et de la communauté sous-culturelle avec ses deux aspects mono- et multi, nous proposons un éclaircissement des notions de culture et de sous-culture, tout en mettant en lumière une série de traits les rapprochant et les distinguant. En lignes générales, la culture représente les valeurs que partagent tous les membres d'une certaine société¹¹. Dans la vision du Guy Rothier¹², la culture représente « L'ensemble des moyens collectifs dont dispose l'homme ou une société pour contrôler ou manipuler l'environnement physique, le monde naturel. »

En dehors de la culture partagée par tous les membres de la société, il y a aussi ce que l'on appelle sous-cultures¹³. L'assimilation et l'adoption de ces dernières marquent une distinction de l'individu des comportements et des valeurs attachés de la société commune et son rapprochement des valeurs moins connues et acceptées par celle-ci. Les sous-cultures prennent naissance et se développent parallèlement à la culture commune et se manifestent dans des situations particulières de contextes sociaux, de préférences artistiques, d'âge, etc. La discussion des deux notions nous permet de voir les sujets analysés dans une hypothèse double à sujet parlant et à leur social à la fois. Les aspects qui déterminent la formation d'une culture sont variables en fonction de la région. On mentionne :

- Le langage. Si on parle du langage en tant que facteur déterminant dans la construction de la culture d'une société, il faut mentionner ses caractères unificateur et/ou divisant. En dehors de son rôle principal, assurer l'intercommunication, le langage assure l'intercompréhension¹⁴ entre les membres de la société en question. On affirme ainsi le rôle que joue le langage et le milieu social dans la construction du langage. L'évolution du langage est celle de la société sont interdépendantes ;
- Les symboles. En lignes générales, les symboles, liés à l'histoire d'une société, se trouvent énoncés dans des représentations mentales que les membres d'une certaine société se fondent sur des idées ou des concepts qui ont marqué certains moments de l'évolution d'une société. Des symboles, liés à l'histoire d'une société, définissent l'identité de celle-ci ;
- L'idéologie. Définie de manière très générale comme l'ensemble des croyances d'une société, la notion d'idéologie met ensemble les axes de la pensée collective et évolue en tenant compte de différentes étapes de l'évolution de la société ;
- Les valeurs. L'éducation, par exemple, constitue pour toute société une des valeurs transmissibles au niveau collectif ayant comme but l'amélioration du comportement individuel. La relation entre l'éducation et la culture peut être analysée sous trois plans distincts du point de vue du contenu, mais convergents pour ce qui est de la perspective des finalités : le plan de la transformation par l'éducation de l'être humain éducatible en un acteur éminemment culturel, le plan de l'éducation en tant qu'acte de transmission et de production de la culture et le plan du rôle de l'éducation dans le contexte du rapport culture-civilisation ;
- Les modèles de comportement-en fonction du milieu où la société évolue, on rencontre certains des 7 types de modèles de comportements¹⁵ découverts par René de Lassus : basané, obéissant, dévoué, rebelle, manipulateur, militaire, incorrigible ;
- Les traditions. La tradition d'une société représente un lien entre son passé et son présent, un lien représenté par la sélection que ce dernier fait dans l'héritage de la tradition. Les valeurs culturelles, se transformant en traditions dans le temps, ont un caractère permanent, ou en devenant ainsi des repères pour la construction d'une société.

VIII. Les axes de la sous-culture carcérale dans la situation d'étude comparative des milieux de réclusion français et roumain

On a souligné dans les lignes précédentes que dans le cas du milieu de la prison on parle d'une sous-culture. D'abord, il est utile de préciser que la manifestation de cette sous-culture a comme prémisses la négation des normes de la culture commune par les acteurs sociaux constituant la population carcérale. On souligne dans cette oplique, que nous trouvons même dans le cas de l'évolution des relations sociales, l'espace physique lui-même de la prison constitue un facteur déterminant pour le développement de la sous-culture en question. Sans lui donner des connotations négatives, la sous-culture de la prison se développe autour des facteurs suivants :

- Les habitudes et les comportements développés en prison. Transmis de délinquant à délinquant et hérités suite à la migration permanente des prisonniers d'un pénitencier à l'autre, les habitudes et les comportements définissent une sous-culture carcérale commune à tous les pénitenciers d'un pays et une sous-culture carcérale individuelle, propre à chaque établissement pénitentiaire ;
- Le folklore de pénitencier. Patrimoine de la population carcérale et de la prison, le folklore se concentre sur la description de tous les aspects de la vie carcérale. Les vers et les chansons de prison présentent dans une lumière héroïque les délinquants, en condamnant par contraste le milieu privé de liberté, le personnel de la prison et l'appareil de la justice. Dans la plupart des situations, les prisonniers n'apprécient pas les mortels qu'ils imposent de la permanence vers créés et transmis de délinquant à délinquant de garder le caractère oral, collectif et relativement insaisissable au niveau du contenu ;
- Le langage. En langage moyen pour la réalisation de la communication, le langage codé, pour ce qui est du milieu de la prison, représente aussi une modalité par laquelle les personnes privées de liberté s'influencent mutuellement ;
- La nature de la construction des relations. Ce processus diffère en fonction du milieu social. Le milieu de réclusion, en essence, constitue un cadre formellement hiérarchisé où l'égalité et la coopération entre les personnes incarcérées s'installe après une période considérable ;
- Le caractère hétérogène de la population carcérale. Le milieu privé de liberté est un milieu marqué par une dynamique permanente des personnes incarcérées. Dans les prisons roumaines, les situations où un délinquant a une condamnation lourde purge sa peine dans un seul établissement pénitentiaire sont rares. Le déplacement permanent des prisonniers (catégorisés comme très dangereux ou faisant partie d'un clan) a comme but d'empêcher des complots qui pourraient avoir lieu entre les délinquants en vue de préparer une évasion ou une révolte.

IX. Fonctions de la culture dans la société civile

Les recherches effectuées sur le fonctionnement de la société commune ont conduit à la mise en discussion de 4 fonctions importantes de la culture¹⁶ :

- D'adaptation. Lors de ses recherches, l'anthropologue américain Clyde Kluckhohn¹⁷ a énoncé la théorie conformément à laquelle la culture nous aide le premier élément permettant à l'individu de s'adapter à un nouveau milieu géographique et à son climat. En suivant ses opinions, c'est toujours la culture qui permet à l'individu de trouver des solutions pour s'adapter (maison, nourriture, vêtements) ;

- De communication. En essence, la communication prend la forme de l'utilisation du langage et des symboles, ces deux moyens permettent la distinction des individus entre eux et des groupes soit aux entres eux. Dans cette perspective, les individus partageant les valeurs de la même culture établissent la communication plus facilement que si cela devait se faire avec des individus appartenant à d'autres cultures ;
- D'anticipation. Liée aux comportements et attitudes, cette fonction vise leur appropriation par l'individu. Partageant la même culture, les individus adoptent des comportements et des attitudes semblables et manifestent des attitudes prévisibles les uns envers les autres ;
- La quatrième fonction vise la culture en tant que facteur favorisant le développement de certains types de relations affectives entre les individus du même groupe social. Elle propose l'identification de l'individu avec les mêmes valeurs, symboles, normes et modèles de conduite.

X. Fonctions de la sous-culture dans le milieu de réclusion

Par rapport aux fonctions que la culture a dans le cas de bouc socialisé, la sous-culture du milieu de détention répond à des fonctions comme¹⁸ :

- L'intégration. Démarche individuelle pour toute personne privée de liberté, l'intégration dans le groupe social de la prison correspond à l'acceptation en sens double : interne, dont de la part du délinquant social, du nouveau contexte social et externe, venant des membres déjà existants dans la communauté vers le nouveau-venu ;
- La communication. On parle d'un processus qui implique de la part du sujet parlant devenu l'appropriation de certains savoirs et s'adapter aux nouvelles situations de communication, s'approprier les mêmes codes de communication avec les collègues de détention et utiliser ces derniers ;
- L'adaptation. Le milieu de réclusion impose une adaptation double. Au niveau du langage utilisé entre les murs de la prison et au niveau comportemental. Dans le milieu de détention, l'intégration de la personne détenue correspond à l'harmonisation du comportement individuel à l'ensemble du comportement collectif spécifique à une communauté sociolinguistique plus restreinte que la communauté source qui présuppose des situations nouvelles de communication, certaines rigueurs et privations ;
- *La socialisation*¹⁹. Dans le milieu de réclusion, en fonction du nombre de prisonniers par cellule et de leurs activités, le processus de socialisation présuppose l'acquisition de nouvelles compétences linguistiques et sociocommunicatives par le locuteur pour pouvoir établir un contact avec les collègues de détention et avec le personnel de la prison ;
- L'innovation. La communication est multicanale et multicode (Orethioni, 1990 : 48). Le milieu de la prison impose la création de nouveaux codes de communication²⁰ ainsi que la création d'éléments lexicaux qui permettent typage du message, sa dissimulation et l'éventuelle induction en erreur des non membres de la Communauté analysée ;

- La conservation des habitudes du monde de la prison est très liée au respect de certaines hiérarchies. Manière de socialisation positive, la conservation des habitudes assure la cohésion de groupe ;
- La création de nouvelles normes et valeurs. L'acceptation ou la négation des normes et des valeurs d'une société montre le degré d'intégration d'un certain individu au sein de la Communauté en question. Distinctions de celles au bout desquelles la société commune se constitue, les normes et les valeurs dirigent la vie de prison sont créées pour que la personne détenue exprime le sentiment d'appartenance²¹ au nouveau milieu et le désaccord par rapport à la société qui l'a rejeté.

Conclusions

Pour offrir une perspective nouvelle dans l'analyse du discours de la prison, le chercheur conscris a d'émarche séquentielle à partir de quelques oppositions. La première vise les notions d'institution et d'institutionnel. Dans un premier temps, nous avons défini l'institution en général et expliqué les raisons qui déterminent l'approchement de la prison du standard d'une institution. Dans un deuxième temps, l'analyse a permis la mise en évidence des points communs qui rapprochent le fonctionnement du discours carcéral de celui du discours institutionnel standard, ainsi que la réflexion sur les points de distinction.

Progressivement le développement de cette recherche nous a permis une approche comparative du milieu de réclusion français et roumain s'inspirant de la dichotomie culture/sous-culture, opposition qui a permis une réflexion plus développée sur le milieu commun (avec les éléments distinctifs et non distinctifs qui le composent) tout en exposant de la culture par rapport au milieu carcéral tout en représentant une sous-culture, tout en s'appuyant sur les mêmes aspects. En déclinant le discours de la prison du discours institutionnel au sens strict le chercheur a souligné le caractère innovateur des éléments lexicaux qui définissent le premier et la variété des situations de communication, le tout dans la perspective du développement dans un milieu mon-/multilingue et mono-/multiculturel.

NOTES

- ⁴ Nous utilisons le syntagme collègues de détention énoncé que dans le témoignage des prisonniers dans la relation avec les autres et les responsables de la prison ainsi que dans leur manifestation disruptive on remarque une complexité qui a comme but l'exclusion du non membre de la communauté.

- ⁶ Les représentations sociales sont des systèmes d'interprétation régissant notre relation au monde et aux autres qui, orientent et organisent les conduites et les communications sociales. ¹⁹ D'après Sykes (1958), il y a cinq privations majeures qui influencent le caractère de la personne : perte de la liberté, perte des biens, manque du bénéfice de services, privation d'hétérosexualité, perte d'autonomie, perte de la sécurité. Proches de ce que l'on trouve dans différents textes au fur et à mesure des étapes de la vie qui se manifestent en deux temps, la socialisation est à la fois primaire et secondaire sur l'émotionnel des individus, qui dès le début de leur vie internalisent les normes, les schémas de base – notamment la langue, les dispositions qui leur permettent de se repérer dans le monde social (la famille, les bandes). Lors de la socialisation primaire, les individus forment leur premier univers. Ils deviennent ainsi capables de faire face à la vie sociale tout en intégrant dans leur existence les éléments sociaux de base : normes, valeurs, croyances, règles de comportement. Secondaire se développe lors de l'adolescence et à l'âge adulte. Orientée vers la neutralité affective, la socialisation secondaire représente le processus permettant aux individus de s'intégrer à des « mondes sociaux (professionnel, scolaire) spécialisés » (Lévi-Strauss, 1983 : 42). La Spéciale prend comme milieu de manifestation ce que Goffman appelle « institutions locales » (1968 : 41).

ABSTRACT: Ethno-linguistic analysis of the passage of German settlers in Cameroon from 1884 to 1916

This work deals with linguistic and cultural evidence of the passage of German settlers in Cameroon. The data used come from the linguistic borrowings present in local languages and flourishing or declining facts present in the popular imagination. Linguistically, it makes an inventory of the vocabulary borrowed from the German language and provides a pragmatic interpretation of utterances recorded in local languages. It covers the period from the arrival of the Germans in Cameroon in 1884 to their departure in 1916. In a diachronic and synchronic approach, it analyses the different phonological, semantic and pragmatic variables taken by borrowing in a century based on oral sources.

Introduction

Au moment où le Cameroun bascule sous le projecteur allemand le 12 juillet 1884, le pays n'est pas unifié et le territoire qui n'est né s'appelle Douala (Harry, 1968). Sur ce territoire, le commerce avec les anglais était prospère et le pidgin-english servait de langue de large communication même après l'installation des Allemands. Le premier changement formel intervint le 1^{er} janvier 1901 avec la signature d'un décret allemand qui imposa l'usage du mot « Kamerun » sur l'ensemble du pays. En ce moment, la langue douala continuait d'être admise comme langue de l'éducation sous la tolérance de l'église protestante anglaise. Voyant l'influence de l'allemand menacée en dehors de l'administration des affaires formelles, le colon décida de limiter au maximum possible l'usage des langues locales hors de leurs aires linguistiques naturelles.

Il est ainsi qu'une conférence sur l'éducation au Kamerun eut lieu en 1907 sous la présidence du gouverneur Seitz (Harry, 1968). Le 25 avril 1910, ce dernier prit un arrêté précisant que l'allemand était la langue de l'éducation à l'exclusion de toute autre langue européenne et locale. Malgré tout, l'influence du pidgin-english continua de croître au sein de la communauté camerounaise à cause de son système grammatical considéré comme étant plus facile.

Dans une démarche diachronique et synchronique, nous cherchons à savoir s'il existe encore de nos jours des traces de l'allemand dans nos langues locales. Si oui, quelles en seraient les variables phonologiques, sémantiques et pragmatiques un siècle après le départ des Allemands ? Pour le savoir, nous utilisons les sources orales de l'histoire du Cameroun (Dika Akwa, 1974) pour l'inventaire des mots d'origine allemande dans quatre langues camerounaises représentatives des régions marquées par le passage des Allemands. Il s'agit des langues duala parlée à Douala qui fut la porte d'entrée des Allemands, la résidence des gouverneurs et le siège du gouvernement entre 1885 et 1901 (Abwa, 2010), le béï-fang (dialectes bulu et ewondo) parlée à Ebolowa et Yaoundé où l'histoire des Allemands avec les chefs locaux Charles Aangan-gana et Martin Paul Samba fut très mouvementée, le shupamem parlée dans le royaume Bamoun où les Allemands s'appuyèrent sous l'administration du Sultan Ibrahim Njoya et l'efé'efe' parlée à Banka où l'église catholique insalla l'une de ses plus grandes missions. En raison du manque d'informations, nous n'avons pas couvert d'autres théâtres des opérations comme Bouéa, Kribi, Tibati, Yoko, Yokadouma, etc., où les Allemands étaient aussi passés. Les transcriptions phonétiques se sont faites à l'aide de l'alphabet phonétique africain (APA).

1. Les emprunts lexicaux

Les seules traces linguistiques de l'allemand comme langue de l'éducation nous viennent du shupamem, langue du royaume Bamoun considéré comme ayant été pro-Allemand (Abwa, 2010). On y retrouve les mots « Lera'a [lehrer] » qui signifie « enseignant ». Le mot dérivé est « Lerewa » qui signifie à la fois « école » et « livre ». En effet, le roi Njoya, inventeur du shumom (écriture bamoun), bâtit un royaume admiré par le colon. À leur arrivée en 1902, les Allemands ne trouvèrent pas nécessaire d'y implanter une administration coloniale, estimant que le territoire était parfaitement administré (Harry, 1968). Aussi, les missionnaires européens furent impressionnés en 1907 par la modernité du royaume Bamoun plus avancée que les autres en Afrique centrale. Afin de ne pas perdre son privilège et de garder son rôle, le Sultan Bamoun n'opposa aucune résistance aux allemands suite au protectorat qu'il avait signé volontairement en 1884. On note que seule une mission protestante s'établit dans le royaume Bamoun avec l'ouverture d'une école que fréquentaient les enfants du souverain et des autres chefs. Or, cela permet de comprendre pourquoi dans cette seule partie du Cameroun, on retrouve l'influence de l'allemand sur le lexique scolaire de la langue locale utilisée dès cette époque pour rédiger des dizaines de textes et d'ouvrages (Dugas et Jeffreys, 1950). D'ailleurs en 1908, l'école royale s'appela « Bamoun Schule des Häupling Ndschoya in Fumban » où l'on enseignait l'écriture Bamoun.

La politique linguistique des Allemands qui visait à réduire l'influence de toute autre langue s'est renforcée suite à la volonté des Français d'entrer au Kamerun. Or, c'est ainsi que la demande d'un groupe de missionnaires français catholiques de travailler au Cameroun fut refusée par le gouvernement allemand depuis Berlin. En lieu et place des Français, le colon allemand introduisit les Pallois de Limburg, missionnaires catholiques allemands. De même, en lieu et place des missionnaires protestants anglais à l'instar des baptistes de Londres qui parlaient et enseignaient l'anglais et le duala, le colon allemand attire plus de nouveaux missionnaires protestants mais, locuteurs de l'allemand. Il s'agissait des allemands de la mission Basel. Par conséquent, l'allemand était devenu la langue dominante mais, le pidgin-english continuait de combler les difficultés linguistiques de large communication à cause de son système grammatical plus simple et donc, plus facile à apprendre.

De cette époque où l'allemand était aussi la langue religieuse, l'on ne retrouve une trace que dans la langue beï-fang (régions du Nord-est, Sud-Est du Cameroun) où les presbytériens appellent Dieu, « Gowa [zambe] » en référence à « Gode [Dieu] » en allemand. Sans certitude, l'on peut aussi relever que le mot allemand « Pfarrer » qui signifie « pasteur » se traduit par « fara » en shupamem, « fala » en fe'efe'e et en beï-fang.

2. Les emprunts phonologiques

Pendant le protectorat allemand (Harry, 1968), l'on a noté aussi l'existence d'une mission militaire de conquête des territoires plus intéressante pour les Allemands que les missions d'évangélisation et d'éducation. Les traces linguistiques de la conquête des Allemands se trouvent dans la phonologie et l'alphabet de la langue allemande qui ont influencé l'écriture et la prononciation des noms de certains villages du Cameroun. On note principalement la prononciation du son [k] qui s'écrit souvent « c » dans l'alphabet français et « k » dans l'alphabet allemand. Ainsi, l'écriture actuelle des villes et villages de Yoko, Yokadouma ou Kribi a subi l'influence de l'allemand. Il y a eu effectivement des opérations allemandes. Aussi, le son [v] s'écrit « v » dans l'alphabet français et « w » dans l'alphabet allemand. Ces ainsi que la ville d'Ebolowa se lit jusqu'à nos jours [ebolova] comme en allemand au lieu de [ebolowa] comme ce serait en français. L'histoire rapporte justement que le camerounais, Mebenga M'Ebono, capitaine dans l'armée allemande, s'installa dans cette ville après sa formation en Allemagne à l'Académie militaire allemande sous le nom de « Martin Paul Samba ».

De nos jours aussi, on observe que le nom du Cameroun s'écrit en allemand « Kamerun » dans certains milieux politiques des « nationalistes » où l'on dénonce la colonisation française. Plusieurs raisons expliquent cette sentiment de défiance de la France. D'abord, l'intérêt des « administrateurs » (Kom, 2004) français du Cameroun alors « sous mandat » de la Société des Nations, puis « sous tutelle » des Nations Unies à conserver l'intégrité du territoire camerounais après le départ des allemands en 1916. Ce pays avait en 1911, une superficie totale de 750 000 Km² (Abwa, 2010). Du 04 novembre 1911 au 04 mars 1916, le Cameroun sous protectorat allemand comprenait une partie actuelle du Gabon, du Congo, de la République centrafricaine, du Tchad et du Nigeria. Sous l'administration de la France, le Cameroun perdit dès Mars 1916 près d'un tiers de son territoire, soit 270 000 Km² en violation du traité de Fez destiné à régler le litige sur le Maroc qui permit aussi aux français de céder certains de leurs territoires d'Afrique équatoriale à l'Allemagne bien avant le traité de Versailles de 1919 qui régla le sort des anciennes colonies allemandes.

La seconde raison qui justifie l'écriture du Cameroun avec « K » est la volonté des « nationalistes » de marquer le fait que le Cameroun est né en 1884 sous le protectorat allemand et non pas plus tard sous l'administration française ou anglaise comme l'opinion dominante semble vouloir faire passer (Ngoh, 1988 ; Owona, 1996). Et s'il y avait lieu de respecter les frontières héritées de la colonisation, alors ce serait le retour aux frontières héritées de la colonisation allemande puisque qu'au sens réel du mot « colonisation », seuls les Allemands ont colonisé le Cameroun (Kom, 2004 ; Abwa, 2010). À cet égard, on note dans le passé très récent que dans le conflit qui a opposé militairement le Cameroun au Nigeria au sujet de la Presqu'île de Bakassi, l'État camerounais a fait valoir avec succès devant la Cour Internationale de Justice un vieux traité de l'époque allemande qui date de 1913.

Enfin, l'écriture du Cameroun en allemand évoque une certaine nostalgie de l'époque allemande comparée à l'époque française. Il est difficile de savoir si ce doit être fier d'avoir été colonisé par les « Njaman [German] » est due à la péripécie de la période de la colonisation allemande (32 ans seulement) ou à la volonté manifestée des colons français à éradiquer de l'imaginaire camerounais la période allemande en s'employant à détruire les « vestiges historiques » (Eloundou, 2003) ou les « souvenirs de l'époque allemande » (Temgoua, 2003b). On entend même parler d'un « âge d'or » de la colonisation allemande. Au-delà de cette considération discutable, on note l'existence d'un discours valorisant (Brown, & Levinson, 1978) sur les infrastructures allemandes (bâtimens chemins de fer, ponts, etc.). Dans l'imaginaire populaire, on entend dire « Ces Njaman [Ces Allemands] » en référence à la garantie produite par les produits et marques allemands.

Pour cela, la colonisation allemande est le sillage militaire français (Duval, 2005) on a employé les mêmes méthodes « brutales » (Abwa, 2010) et les visées à mettre sur pied des politiques linguistiques néfastes pour les langues locales et un droit foncier avancé aux colons (Monie, 1973) ou celles visées à réprimer les résistances et nationalismes à travers un système judiciaire injuste. Sur ce dernier point de la même façon que les français érigèrent le Code de l'indigénat qui leur permit d'attribuer les nationalistes de « trahison », les allemands enrôlèrent les nationalistes camerounais et les attribuèrent aussi de trahison suite à leurs résistances. L'ordonnance allemande du 7 avril 1900 sur la justice camerounaise avait été complétée par la loi du 06 octobre 1901 pour tenir compte du statut des indigènes (Tepi, 2001). Il existait un dualisme judiciaire qui permettait de juger différemment les européens et les indigènes pour être soumis aux mêmes services (Monie, 1973).

C'est ainsi que Martin Paul Samba, officier de l'armée allemande diplômé en 1894 et ayant servi pendant 7 ans dans les expéditions allemandes sous le commandement de Hans Dominik, fut accusé de « haute trahison » après sa démission en 1902 pour avoir dénoncé les mauvais traitements des colons sur les femmes et les enfants dans les villages Bulu ou pour s'être rebellé face à la plus grande considération que les colons attribuaient à la tribu des Ewondo au détriment de sa tribu Bulu à travers par exemple l'industrialisation en 1911 de Charles A. Langana comme chef supérieur des Ewondo et Bane (Abwa, 2010).

Aussi, à Douala, le prince Rudolph Douala Manga Bell est accusé de « haute trahison » pour avoir eu la prétention à défendre la souveraineté territoriale du Cameroun conformément du Traité Germano-Duala du 12 juillet 1884 insistant sur le projet de loi qui stipulait que « les terrains livrés par nous, et les emplacements sur lesquels se trouvent des villages, doivent rester la propriété des possesseurs auxquels et de leurs descendants »¹. En effet, en 1910, le projet d'urbanisation (« Gross Duala ») du Gouverneur allemand au Cameroun, Théodore Seitz, visant officiellement à faire de la ville, l'un des plus grands ports d'Afrique, prévoit d'exproprier les Douala de leur lieu d'habitation traditionnelle qui devait devenir la ville européenne. Le colon promettait aux autochtones l'aménagement de nouveaux logements à l'arrière du pays séparés de la ville Européenne par une zone tampon d'un kilomètre de large. Ce projet fut perçu par Rudolf Douala Manga comme étant un « projet d'apartheid » comme on peut lire dans un extrait de sa péroraison du 20 Février 1913 : « Nous commentons par nier le besoin de créer une ville européenne et une ville purement indigène (...). En outre, l'assainissement de Douala n'exige pas une séparation spatiale aussi vaste de ses quartiers »².

À Douala, Kribi, Ebolowa et Maroua, les chefs traditionnels nationalisés attusés pour « haute trahison » ont été exécutés en août 1914. Les seuls survivants ont été ceux qui ont fait le jeu des Allemands notamment le Roi Ibrahim Njoya des Bamoun et le chef supérieur des Ewondo et Bané, Charles A. Langana. C'est la même pratique qui a été perpétuée par les français qui sont accusés d'être responsables de la disparition des nationalisés de l'UP dont les plus influents étaient Um Nyobe et Félix Moumié.

3. Les emprunts culturels

La trace linguistique de la « brutalité des Allemands » (Abwa, 2010) se trouve dans l'insulte « Schwein [schon] » que l'on retrouve dans l'essentiel des langues du Cameroun sous la prononciation [shwan]. On note l'évolution phonologique du phonème /v/ de la graphie « w » qui se maintient en /w/ comme en français. Du point de vue pragmatique linguistique, l'implicite (Kerbrat-Orecchioni, 1986, 2005) qui se dégage de cette insulte est que les Allemands trouvaient que nos aïeux étaient sales comme des cochons. Cette image est restée dans l'imaginaire populaire camerounaise au point où les ressortissants de la ville de Dschang (Ouest du Cameroun) où l'on élève des cochons sont appelés péjorativement « Dshang nkunap [Dshang des cochons] ».

La relation maître-esclave ou chef-sujetes allemandes est restée dans la langue beïfang à travers le nom « Hermann » qui, écrit séparément en allemand signifie « monsieur [herr] » ou « homme [mann] ». Dans l'imaginaire camerounais, le fait de montrer qu'on est un « homme » ou un « monsieur » est synonyme de défiance. Ainsi, chez les Bulu (beï-fang), l'on demande à quelqu'un s'il veut montrer qu'il est « Hermann » en réplique à son attitude haïne. Du point de vue pragmatique cognitif (Reboul & Moeschler, 1998), cela implique soi-même qu'un certain Hermann adopte une attitude de « Chef » qui est restée dans l'imaginaire populaire comme élan une référence de supériorité, soit que tous les « Herr » et les « Mann » (Allemands) qui incragissaient avec les Bulu avaient laissé le sentiment de supériorité. Dans l'histoire, on ne le l'existerait d'un certain Hermann Röhm qui était administrateur du district de Douala au 19^{ème} siècle et qui assisai le juge allemand Niedermeyer président de la Cour de justice.

À l'Ouest du Cameroun, les langues locales emploient plutôt le mot « Njokmasi » qui désigne le « travail de masse » ou mieux « le travail forcé » en référence à l'époque allemande et au mode de recrutement « forcé » (Abwa, 2010) des travailleurs. D'ailleurs, comme au Togo, l'on se rappelle encore des coups de foues des Allemands sur les fesses qui prévoyaient un coup pour le Kaiser : « Ein für Kaiser ! ».

Malgré l'existence de ces faits historiques, il faut dire que dans l'imaginaire populaire camerounais (Fandio et Mongi, 2007), on ne relève aucun discours qui frise l'hystérie collective allant dans le sens de la peur des Allemands. Même à Douala où l'injustice des Allemands avait été durement vécue, l'on ne le l'existerait de la glorification du passé allemand qui s'expliquerait toujours par la « déception » des colons français qui ont administré le territoire après le départ des Allemands. Au lieu de bâtir et de conquérir comme les Allemands, la France s'est donnée une « mission civilisatrice » (Ngando, 2002) mal perçue dans l'opinion. On pense justement que « les Français sont nuls » en référence à un peuple dit « railleur », « luxueux » ou « bavard » par opposition aux Allemands qui sont « pragmatiques ». On peut comprendre que l'imaginaire camerounais s'identifie aux Allemands parce qu'à l'époque, nous étions dans un contexte où « la conquête était faite de loi » et par conséquent la torture faisait aussi partie des méthodes des conquérants diaboliques dans la société traditionnelle. La « mission civilisatrice » ou le « bavardage » des Français n'avait pas sa place. La France a laissé la transition entre le Kamerun et le Cameroun dans « l'impasse » (Priso, 1994), ce qui pousse alors à parler de glorification par compensation d'un apaisement ou d'une confiance que les Français n'ont pas su ou voulu instaurer jusqu'à nos jours. On peut même parler du négationnisme de la France qui veut être fière de son passé colonial au mépris des crimes contre l'humanité commises et aujourd'hui bien documentées. A l'opposé de l'histoire des Juifs, on ne reconnaît à l'Allemagne que l'assassinat des leaders. Cela semble être moins exact par l'imaginaire camerounais que « l'inclination criminelle » de la France qui visait à exterminer des peuples entiers comme l'a été la déclaration du Colonel Lambertson (1960) au sujet des Bamilekés qu'il estimait être un « faillou dans la chausse » du Cameroun dont il faut s'en débarrasser. Et des actes de barbarie considérés comme « Génocide non reconnu » suivirent les événements dans l'histoire et l'imaginaire collectif (Kanguelieu Tchouake, 2007). C'est un mémoire explosif et une bombe à retardement dans le Cameroun contemporain.

Conclusion

Recherchant les preuves linguistiques et culturelles du passage des colons allemands au Cameroun, nous sommes arrivés à l'aide d'une double démarche diachronique et synchronique au résultat selon lequel les traces de l'allemand sont rares dans les langués loŕa les ŕamerounaises ŕomparées aux emprunŕs de l'anglais. ŕ'esŕpeuŕêŕe dû à la volonŕé manifesŕe des ŕoŕons franŕais qui onŕ remplaŕé les Allemands à éradiquer l'allemand du voŕabulaire ŕamerounais. Touŕefois, on noŕe l'exisŕence d'une injure qui renŕeigne sur la qualiŕé d'évalorisanŕe de la relaŕion que les ŕolonisés avaienŕ aveŕ le ŕoŕon allemand. Sur le plan ŕogniŕif, on noŕe que l'évoŕaŕion de la ŕivilisaŕion allemande se faiŕaveŕ une ŕharge émoŕionnelle pouvanŕ ŕonnoŕer la nosŕalgie malgré l'image du nazisme ŕoŕlée à l'Allemagne. En ŕomparaison aveŕ la ŕivilisaŕion franŕaise qui suiviŕle passage des Allemands, on noŕe au ŕontraire le développement d'une esŕèce de senŕimenŕe de reŕeŕm algré la ŕuŕture des droiŕs de l'homme attribuée à la Franŕe. Quel paradoxe ! Esŕŕe un méfaiŕde la « mission ŕivilisaŕice » ou de l'arôŕé de la ŕolonisaŕion franŕaise ? D'autres reŕerŕhes sur la perte pŕion de la Franŕe au ŕameroun permeŕronŕe répondre à ŕeŕe quesŕion.

ABSTRACT: Socio-cultural studies of gender caricatures in the Togolese private press: representation of femininity and masculinity

This article aims to examine more closely the phenomenon of symbolic violence in the Togolese private press (Sika'a) analyzing the stereotypical treatment of gender through caricature. The form is meaningful and the image is to be seen as a representation of the truth. The purpose of this study is seeking to know the existence of a social truth of the woman and the man whose Togolese press echoed through humor and satire. In this study, the literature review and content analysis were used as tools for data collection. The results show that there is a threat of stereotypes, a reproduction of symbolic violence and the social imagination in the production of this magazine.

Introduction

La lutte des femmes pour leur liberté est une lutte légitime pour la simple raison que la participation égale de la femme à la vie sociale économique de sa société est plus qu'une nécessité si l'on veut parler de développement. Mais avant que les femmes ne commencent à participer à la place qui leur revient de droit, elles ont vécu dans l'ombre des hommes qui ne voyaient en elles qu'une présence réduite à un rôle d'épouses et de mères. En effet, la valeur de la femme en tant qu'être humain ne valait pas celle d'un clown dans certaines sociétés comme semble le traduire ce proverbe Ouzbek qui dit : « Mieux vaut donner naissance à un ne pierre qu'à une fille car la pierre servira au moins à construire ». D'ailleurs, la notion ou ces clichés ont pour source plusieurs origines. La place subordonnée de la femme dans la société n'est pas d'ordre naturel mais résulte d'une évolution historique et sociale (Hlomewoo, 2006 : 6).

Pour inverser la tendance dans certains pays du monde à travers les médias, l'on en a fait de l'image de la femme un credo pour battre en brèche ce concept surannée de la position inférieure de la femme et les différents clichés et stéréotypes afférents à ce de dernière. Aujourd'hui, l'histoire de l'ascension sociale des femmes à travers l'espace et le temps apporte un démenti brutal aux préjugés des adeptes pessimistes des capacités de la femme à en reprendre et à se réaliser. En moins de deux générations, les femmes ont conquis leur autonomie et obtenu le pouvoir masculin au foyer, dans l'éducation et au travail même s'il reste encore du chemin à faire dans un domaine stratégique et celui du politique (Dorier, 2013 : 5). Ainsi existe-t-il par exemple en France aujourd'hui des magazines spécialisés (Amina...) dans l'imagerie de la femme.

La présente étude est structurée en trois parties : (i) la première partie concerne la problématique, le matériel et méthode de la recherche ; (ii) la deuxième partie est consacrée à la présentation des résultats ; (iii) et la troisième partie est réservée à la discussion et conclusion.

1. État du problème

Au Togo, il n'existe pas encore de magazines féminins tels qu'on en trouve dans d'autres pays, notamment dans les pays occidentaux. Jusqu'ici, il n'existe qu'une presse d'information, « généraliste » et plutôt « pudique » sur certaines thématiques. En moins de 5 ans (à partir de 2008), le paysage médiatique togolais s'est enrichi successivement de trois magazines satiriques et humoristiques qui fondent l'image de la femme leur fonds de commerce. Mais, à côté de ces stéréotypes sexuels et matérialistes auxquels d'autres médias du monde nous ont habitués, apparaissent déjà des stéréotypes assez inhabituels comme ceux liés à la domination ou à la tyrannie supposée de la femme, à la désertion de la femme de son rôle de mère, etc. La nouvelle vision de la féminité qui en découle détermine une nouvelle place de la femme et assigne à l'homme une place correspondante dans les rapports de couple où justement les rôles sont parfois inversés.

L'hypothèse de cette étude stipule que la représentation de la féminité et de la masculinité dans les magazines togolais reproduit l'imaginaire social d'une part mais s'enrichit aussi d'autre part d'un débournement de clichés traditionnellement associés aux femmes, entraînant ainsi une inversion d'attributs féminins et masculins.

La caricature par principe est provocatrice, elle déforme, exagère certains vices ou caractéristiques du sujet visé. Le dessin caricatural, peint en réalité l'anormal afin de « choquer et offenser une prise de conscience, parfois une autocritique, ramener à la norme qu'elle exaltera à l'envers » (Melo 1975 : 123). Aussi peut-on se demander si l'image donnée de la femme par ces magazines créés et dirigés par des hommes reflète la réalité ? Quels sont les clichés ou stéréotypes récurrents ? Quel message ou lecture implicite se dégage de ce traitement ? Des caricatures produisent-elles pas une violence symbolique et nous construisent-elles un imaginaire social ? et sont-elles les questions fondamentales qui orientent cette étude.

2. Matériel et méthode

Il est aussi exposé dans cette partie de l'étude les méthodes, les outils de collecte des données utilisés et le traitement des informations de base qui a été fait.

2.1. Matériel

2.1.1. Zone d'étude

2.1.1.1. Situation géographique et présentation du milieu humain

Pays de l'Afrique de l'Ouest, le Togo couvre une superficie de 56 600 km² et subdivisé en 5 régions administratives. Sa capitale est Lomé. Sur le plan démographique, la population togolaise est estimée à 6 191 155 habitants en 2011 avec 51,3% de femmes et 48,7% d'hommes¹. Le taux d'accroissement naturel de 2,58% comparé au taux moyen de croissance (1,1%) sur la décennie précédente atteste de la pression en matière de demande de bien-être des populations. La structure par âge est caractérisée par une forte proportion des jeunes de moins de 15 ans, lesquels représentent 47,7% de la population totale. La population potentiellement active représente 48% de la population totale du pays. La densité moyenne de la population est de 80 habitants/km², mais elle varie d'une zone à une autre. Ainsi elle est de 21 habitants/km² dans la Région Centrale et de 163 habitants/km² dans la Région Maritime (DGSN, 2011). Cette répartition spatiale très variable est exacerbée par les systèmes de production qui diffèrent d'une zone à une autre (Kamana, 2012). Au Togo, 62,6% des habitants vivent en milieu rural (DGSN, 2011). Elle tendante subit un changement rapide : la population urbaine croît de 4,4% par an contre 2,4% pour la population rurale. Il existe au Togo une quarantaine de groupes sociolinguistiques répartis en six groupes et dont les trois principales (Adja-Ewé, Kabyè-Tem et Para-Gourma-Akan) constituent près de 87% de la population (Kuévi, 1981 : 22-23). Près de quarante langues totales sont utilisées laissant en outre l'individualité de chaque groupe socioculturel. Sur le plan religieux, 60% de la population togolaise est animiste, 18% sont chrétiens et 12% pratiquent la religion musulmane².

2.2. Présentation de la presse togolaise

La loi n° 90-025 du 30 novembre 1990 sur la presse togolaise a permis la libéralisation des fréquences et l'éclosion des premières stations radios, télévisions privées, et presse privée³. Dès lors, le paysage médiatique togolais sera profondément transformé. De nombreuses radios, télévisions privées et presse écrite commerciale, culturelles et confessionnelles voient le jour (Kamana, 2008). De 1990 à 2005, quatre-vingt-deux fréquences ont été distribuées à travers tout le territoire national, soit par le Ministère des Télécommunications soit par l'Autorité de Régulation et de Contrôle pour gérer les fréquences dans la nouvelle situation de concurrence (Ngbanja, 2006). Depuis lors elle a beaucoup évolué et est marquée aujourd'hui par une floraison de titres et des médias privés qui cohabitent avec les médias publics. L'espace médiatique est régulé par une instance indépendante dénommée, la Haute Autorité de l'Audiovisuel et de la Communication (HAAC). Comme un peu partout dans les pays africains francophones, la presse privée même si elle a obtenu une autorisation d'existence et des textes qui garantissent son fonctionnement de manière très tributaire d'un environnement économique difficile qui ne lui permet pas de prendre son envol. En ce qui concerne, les magazines qui font l'objet de l'étude, ils sont presque les derniers nés de la presse privée qui est spécialisée dans la circulation de Sika'a (2008) et Viva (2012)⁴.

La méthodologie adoptée pour la présente étude s'articule autour de trois phases non ammenées recherche documentaire, la collecte des informations puis le traitement et l'analyse des données.

2.3. Méthode et traitement des données

La démarche méthodologique adoptée est qualitative. Elle s'appuie sur l'analyse de contenu pour faire émerger le dénoyaué de contenu. Ici, il s'agit d'interpréter les images elles-mêmes de manière à en tirer le plus d'informations possibles non seulement sur leurs contenus (en termes de stéréotypes véhiculés sur la féminité et la masculinité) mais aussi, sur les différences attendues (femme/homme) et les types d'interactions qu'ils en déclenchent. L'étude a porté sur la représentation de la féminité et la masculinité dans le magazine Sika'a paru en 2008-2013. Au total, 90 numéros du magazine Sika'a ont été analysés. Deux moyens d'investigations ont été utilisés dans cette étude : l'analyse de contenu et l'analyse de contenu (Muzielli, 2006) en vue de rassembler les informations et données qualitatives pour les besoins d'analyse allant dans le sens de répondre aux questions du sujet posé. Le Statistical Package for Social Science (SPSS) a permis de mener les opérations suivantes : la codification, la conception du masque de saisie et l'entrée des données. Après ces opérations, les données ont été ensuite purées et un logiciel de traitement des données (Excel) a été utilisé pour la réalisation des graphiques.

3. Résultats

3.1. Représentation des traits/états des femmes dans Sika'a

3.1.1. Traits physiques des femmes

Les résultats de la Figure 3 montrent que les traits physiques les plus représentés sont sexuelles (10 fois) imposantes (5 fois) et plus charmanes (3 fois) chez la femme. Elles sont aussi stériles (2 fois) et violentes (2 fois). Les traits physiques les moins représentés (1 fois) chez les femmes sont femme bombes, chiffonnées, effilées, influentes, laides, mastoïdes, postérieure abondante, riches, tracassantes et traditionnelles (Figure 3).

3.1.2. Traits moraux des femmes

Les résultats de la Figure 4 révèlent que les traits moraux les plus représentés chez les femmes sont dévergondées (12 fois) imposantes (5 fois) et charmanes (3 fois). Les traits moraux qui sont revenus plus ou moins dans la représentation des femmes sont riches (2 fois), imaginatives (2 fois), sérieuses (2 fois), insoumises (2 fois), énaies (2 fois), responsables (2 fois). Ce ux qui sont les moins représentés (1 fois) chez les femmes sont l'hypocrisie, la grossière et le pernicieux. (Figure 4).

L'analyse des résultats de la Figure 5 révèle que les traits psychologiques les plus représentés sont naïve (16 fois) suivie de la sensuelle (7 fois) et la dévotion (3 fois). Les traits psychologiques qui sont plus ou moins fréquents chez les femmes sont désemparées (2 fois), déterminées (2 fois), suspicieuses (2 fois), créatrices (2 fois), imprudentes (2 fois) et inconstantes (2 fois). Ce ux qui sont revenus au moins une fois chez les femmes sont la jalousie, l'amour, la prudence, l'excitation, la maturité, le défaitisme, la passivité, la malheureuse, l'insatiable et l'indiscrète (Figure 5).

3.2.1. Traits physiques des hommes

Les résultats de la Figure 6 montrent que le trait physique le plus représenté chez les hommes est la violence. Ils sont effilés (3 fois) et nains (3 fois). Par contre beaux (3 fois) et édentés (4 fois) sont revenus plus ou moins dans la représentation des hommes (Figure 6). L'exercice de la violence peut entraîner une dégradation des femmes et des hommes eux-mêmes.

Les résultats de la Figure 7 révèlent que les traits moraux le plus représentés chez les hommes sont le mensonge (12 fois), irresponsabilité (8 fois), orgiaques (6 fois) grossiers (5 fois). Les préjugés qui font dire des femmes qu'elles sont des sexes faibles conduisent naturellement à penser que les hommes sont les seuls capables de toute ce qui peut arriver de mal à leur partenaire. Or cette réalité rime avec des termes susmentionnés. Un seul trait moral est revenu au moins deux fois dans la représentation des hommes, il s'agit notamment d'insensibles (2 fois). Par contre les traits les moins représentés (1 fois) chez les hommes sont l'ingratitude, l'ambition et la paillardise (Figure 7).

3.2.3. Traits psychologiques des hommes

Les résultats de la figure 8 confirment que les traits psychologiques le plus représentés chez les hommes sont l'excitation (18 fois), la détermination (9 fois), libidineux (7 fois), autoritaires, furieux et imprudents (3 fois) contre deux traits qui sont revenus au moins deux fois dans la représentation des hommes, il s'agit notamment d'érotiques et d'abusifs (2 fois). En revanche, les traits les moins représentés (1 fois) chez les hommes sont notamment la soumission, la flexibilité, l'influence, l'intimidation et l'hypocrisie (Figure 8).

4. Discussion et conclusion

Le sexe est porteur et fait vendre, les journaux. En présence des femmes sous l'angle sexuel, ils ne font que surfer sur la représentation sociale de la femme.

4.1. L'effet solo dans sika'a

On désigne par « l'effet solo », l'effet du sexe minoritaire dans un groupe / moins bonnes interventions orales des femmes faite à un groupe exclusivement masculin que devant un groupe mixte par exemple. Si les femmes sont « la moitié du ciel », pour reprendre une expression chinoise, et même davantage puisqu'elles représentent au Togo 51,3% de la population, pourquoi sont-elles aussi dominées par des hommes au Togo ? Les stéréotypes peuvent contribuer à des comportements qui nuisent au bien-être de leurs d'identification (Rescir & Gresy, 2008 : 9).

Le caractère quasi universel de la domination masculine n'est pas en soi étonnant. Une société ne peut pas vivre sans règles d'éthiques en général et d'éthique matrimoniale en particulier. Dans cette perspective, ce sont les femmes qui sont échangées puisqu'elles quittent leurs parents pour s'installer chez leur mari. Or s'il y a échange de femmes, elles sont forcément menées en situation de dominées (Hériatier, 1996). La division sexuelle du travail n'est pas une conséquence logique des handicaps naturels liés à la maternité, mais est le produit d'un rapport de pouvoir entre les genres (Friedman, 1984). Labita, dans Engels et l'émancipation des femmes (1997 : 175-191) montre que selon Engels le caractère historique de la place du bordonné des femmes. Selon lui, la place de la femme dans la société était considérée et non négligeable d'aujourd'hui plus qu'en ces temps, c'était la femme qui faisait tourner le ménage par sa passion à toutes les activités de la vie sociale. Et ce par cette passion lui conférait une liberté et une indépendance vis-à-vis de l'homme. Mais l'apparition de nouvelles formes de richesses et l'avènement de l'économie de marché ont fait perdre à la femme cette considération qu'elle avait jadis. Dans les divers médias et notamment dans le magazine Sika'a bien des caricatures influencent de façon psychologique la vie des jeunes-filles et une frange non négligeable des femmes actives à Lomé. Aujourd'hui, ces caricatures emplissent les conversations et modifient un peu de façon subrepticite les relations interpersonnelles, que ce soit au travail ou dans la sphère privée. Il est difficile d'apprécier l'importance et le rôle des caricatures du magazine à la fois sur la construction identitaire erronée de la geneféminine au Togo.

4.2. Menace de stéréotype dans Sika'a

Pour les sociologues, le stéréotype est une caractérisation symbolique et stigmatisante d'un groupe, qui s'appuie sur des attitudes et des jugements de routine. Les stéréotypes sont des images qui bloquent et qui figent à un instant donné, qui empêchent d'avancer et qui portent atteinte à l'estime de soi (Grand dictionnaire encyclopédique Larousse, 1985). Ils fonctionnent à longueur de temps, comme des messages subliminaux qui confortent les rôles sociaux traditionnels et les pérennisent. Les résultats de cette étude révèlent que les hommes sont pleins de vices. Ils sont notamment menteurs (12 fois), irresponsables (8 fois), orgiaques (6 fois) grossiers (5 fois). Sur le plan physique les résultats montrent que les hommes sont exotés (18 fois), déshabillés (9 fois), libidineux (7 fois), autoritaires, furieux et imprudents (3 fois) (cf. Figures 6, 7, 8 et 9).

Par rapport aux femmes les résultats montrent que les caricatures laissent à voir les clichés traditionnels que les hommes ont de la femme pendant longtemps. D'après les résultats, les femmes sont naïves (16 fois), sexuelles (10 fois) et sensuelles (7 fois) (cf. Figures 3, 4 et 5). Une analyse approfondie du discours de l'auteur de Sika'a donne le contenu esquivement rapporté dans les lignes suivantes apporte un démenti au cliché de femmes naïves : « Depuis que j'ai commencé à parler sika'a en 2012 je n'ai jamais raconté une parodie sur ma plume de lire toutes vos parodies toutes vos rubriques. Mais ce qui me gêne pour quoi ? es-BELLAVI qui gagne toujours et notre fameux sodja Taméa toujours maa ? »⁵

En effet un rapport sur l'image des femmes dans les médias en 2008 (Reseir & Gresy) révèle que dans les médias, fleurissent les images de la mère, de l'idiot, blonde de surcroît, de l'hystérique déjantée, sinon de la puante, sans parler de la ménagère. Aussi fleurissent dans la sphère politique, les trois stéréotypes de la tournaise qui arrive grâce aux hommes, de la « king » à l'identité sexuelle douteuse et qui adopte un comportement dit « l'homme » et de la régente ou la mère qui règne de façon provisoire. Les rôles sociaux (véhiculés par les médias) agissent comme une identité symbolique qu'on endosse au-dessus de la sienne propre afin de répondre aux stéréotypes du genre ou du sexe social auquel on appartient. Les hommes doivent tous être grands, forts intelligents, pères (pour prouver l'authenticité de sa virilité), ayant la maîtrise de l'argent, la politique et l'économie, puissants, voire violents. Les femmes doivent toutes être plus petites, faibles, soumises, mères (parce que faites pour), ayant en charge le ménage, le soin aux enfants aux personnes âgées, aux blessés, douteuses et incompréhensives⁶.

Les caricatures véhiculent des stéréotypes de genre. Elles définissent et enferment les femmes et les hommes dans des rôles prédéfinis, artificiels et souvent dégradants, humiliants et abâtissant pour les deux sexes. Des stéréotypes participent à une discrimination fondée sur le genre et se font l'écho d'un rapport de force inégal (Reseir & Gresy, 2008 : 9).

4.3. Sika'a : reproducteur de la violence symbolique et de l'imaginaire social

Les résultats de cette étude révèlent que ce magazine créé et géré par les hommes ne peine pas la genreféminine en blanc. En effet la domination des hommes sur la femme a trouvé une autre explication chez Pierre Bourdieu. En effet dans La domination masculine (1998), il trouve naturelle la domination des hommes sur les femmes. Cette naturalisation des rapports sociaux s'inscrit dans et emmené dans les comportements des dominants-les hommes-et des dominés-les femmes-et les pousse à agir conformément à la logique de ces rapports sociaux. Les hommes doivent se conformer à la logique de l'honneur. Ils doivent toujours faire preuve de leur virilité et les femmes doivent se conformer à la discrétion, au service et à la docilité. C'est ce qu'il appelle « la violence symbolique ». Les médias permettent de gérer la relation entre notre cerveau et notre environnement. Ils sont des agrégateurs d'images, des socialisateurs, et en aucun cas le reflet exact du réel (op.cit.). Maté parle, à ce propos, de « médiation médiatique ». Les médias représentent une voie majeure de socialisation.

Les représentations qu'elles génèrent nous suivent un mode de connaissance ; mais contribuent dans le même temps à l'élaboration des identités individuelles et sociales, à la diffusion de normes, conduites et valeurs (Mazé, 2006). Tout système de représentation est aussi un système de valeurs. (...) Il est important de souligner que les représentations ne sont pas le reflet de l'état de la réalité mais donnent à voir une mise en forme, voire une mise en ordre de la réalité, visant non seulement à expliciter un ordre social établi, mais aussi à le légitimer (Dorier, 2008).

Au demeurant, à quoi donc servent ces images de femmes très présentes la plupart des temps dans ce magazine ? Elles sont un puissant moyen dont dispose les hommes majoritaire dans cet organe pour nous faire et ordonner la femme togolaise. Le sexe est porteur et fait vendre, ce magazine saurique. En équilibre les femmes de naïves, de sexuelles et de dévergondé, il ne fait que perpétuer encore une fois la représentation sociale des mâles de la femme.

L'ONU face aux défis de l'effondrement et de la reconstruction des États africains affectés par des conflits ethniques

David Eyoukéani KOULOUNG

ABSTRACT: The UN challenges in collapse and reconstruction of African states affected by ethnic conflicts

The collapse of the authoritarian political systems in 1990s in Central and Eastern Europe has favoured the emergence of the Third democratization around the world. In Sub-Saharan Africa since 1960s, the construction of the authoritarian party has been justified by the African political elites to preserve social cohesion and promote social justice in plural societies. During the authoritarian period the African leaders have built their political system through the imaginary which says that in Africa the power of an individual belongs to the ethnic group. Nevertheless, from the 1990s the political pluralism encourages the creation of opposition political parties. These new opponents challenge the authoritarian leaders by mobilizing their ethnic group. In some cases, the transition has resulted in a civil war between different political leaders. They manipulate ethnic divisions and are willing to sacrifice their peoples fuelling civil war to gain political power. When conflicts erupt, African political elites use the youth, women and children in their rebel movements to attract the attention of the international community. As soon as the rebels organizations occupy a part of the territory they exploit all natural resources to pay weapons. They are aware that using child soldiers and female combatants means put pressure on the United Nations and others in international organizations to find a power-sharing agreement between them and the political authorities. However, with the intervention of the UN, it happens that the negotiation of peace agreements leads to impunity and power sharing between the warriors. Rebel movements are transformed into political parties, which menace the foundation of the State in Africa.

This present paper focuses on the contribution of the UN in the restoration and the consolidation of the African States. It also shows the greed of rebels when they don't respect the peace and agreements which threatens peace and political stability in postconflict period.

Introduction

Depuis la restauration du pluralisme partisan en Afrique suite à l'effondrement du bloc Communiste dans les années 1990, l'Afrique subsaharienne continue de souffrir de ces déchirures sociales causées par des conflits politiques à résonance ethniques. Des déchirures sociales nées sous la Colonisation ont pris des formes muldimensionnelles selon des aires géographiques et idéologiques après les indépendances. Selon les rapports de l'ONU, l'Afrique subsaharienne a connu 19 guerres civiles déclarées et 11 génocides, alors qu'il y en a eu 24 ailleurs dans le monde de 1960 à 1980. Au début des années 1990, les Africains représentaient 43% de la population des réfugiés dans le monde. La plupart de ces réfugiés fuyaient les violences politiques et ethniques, et un grand nombre parmi eux mouraient de faim, de froid et de maladies. La majorité de ces réfugiés étaient des enfants et des femmes. Selon les estimations de l'UNHCR, 850 000 enfants auraient pu vivre mais, ils sont morts entre 1980 et 1988 par suite des deux grandes guerres civiles qui ont eu lieu en Angola et au Mozambique (Amoo, 1997). Dans les pays africains en proie à des conflits internes violents le plus souvent l'État est incapable de contrôler tout le territoire et d'assurer la sécurité des populations locales. Les organisations rebelles qui contrôlent les zones occupées pillent et exploitent illégalement toutes les ressources naturelles qu'ils trouvent sur leur passage.

Des conflits internes engendrent progressivement l'effondrement de toutes les structures étatiques laissant la place aux organisations criminelles d'opérer dans l'illégalité (Lapham, 1998). Ils constituent une réelle menace à la sécurité collective et la paix internationales. Ils engendrent la paupérisation de toutes les couches socio-professionnelles et attirent d'avantage le risque d'instabilité politique (Menkhaus, 2002). Appréhendé le plus souvent comme le résultat d'un cas extrême de problèmes de gouvernance, de pressions excessives sur les capacités de l'État à gouverner, l'effondrement de l'État devient une question de degré par rapport aux difficultés normales rencontrées dans l'exercice de l'autorité. Au Liberia, en Sierra Leone, au Rwanda et en Côte d'Ivoire dans une moindre mesure, les crispations ethniques ont souvent engendré des crispations politiques, conduisant parfois à des conflits armés internes (Hélingner, 2003).

Des facteurs conjoncturels consolident le risque d'investissement économique dans les États africains en crise et menacent les pays voisins. L'ONU crée pour préserver la paix et la sécurité internationales œuvre inlassablement en amont à travers ses différents organes dans la diplomatie préventive et le rétablissement de la paix. Elle intervient en aval dans le domaine de la consolidation de la paix et cherche à empêcher la résurgence des conflits et à créer les conditions nécessaires pour qu'une paix puisse régner durablement dans ces sociétés plurielles déchirées par les conflits internes (Annan, 1998). Dès lors la question qui se pose de suite est la suivante : Doit-on considérer l'effondrement des États africains en crise comme un échec du processus de formation de l'État en Afrique subsaharienne ? D'ailleurs l'ONU peut-elle contribuer à la consolidation durable de la paix dans les États effondrés suite à un conflit ethnique ?

L'objectif de cette étude est d'analyser le processus d'effondrement des États africains affectés par des conflits ethniques et de démontrer l'existence d'un modèle causal minimal commun impliqué dans ces États lors de la phase de rétablissement/démonstration de la paix. Une telle entreprise nécessite la compréhension des théories des conflits et les mécanismes de rétablissement de la paix déployés par le Conseil de sécurité de l'ONU.

Pour analyser les conflits ethniques en cours sur le continent noir, plusieurs théories tentent de saisir les facteurs endogènes et exogènes liés à l'implosion de ces conflits et conflits qualifiés. Mais dans notre analyse, nous nous référons à la théorie des conflits reposant sur les besoins humains dans un contexte de mondialisation de John W. Burton. Selon le politologue américain, outre les besoins biologiques évidents tels que l'alimentation et le logement les groupes humains manifestent de plus en plus des besoins sociopsychologiques de base qui sont : la croissance et le développement, des besoins sociaux de l'identité, de la reconnaissance, la sécurité, la participation et l'autonomie. L'implosion des conflits ethniques résulte de la méconnaissance ou de la répression de ces besoins de développement qui n'ont pas été satisfaits par les structures élitaires (Burton, 1990).

Les crises identitaires nées du développement inégal des régions et des ethnies, les frustrations historiques, la montée du chômage des jeunes et l'existence de divisions politiques tranchées sur les identités ethniques sont donc les ressources politiques indispensables dans le déclenchement des conflits ethniques. Même si tous les conflits internes ne sont pas ethniques, tous les conflits ethniques en cours sur le continent africain ne conduisent pas forcément à l'effondrement de l'État. À cet effet le politologue américain William Zartman pense quant à lui que : « un État effondré est un État qui ne peut plus assurer ni sa sécurité interne, ni sa sécurité externe sur un territoire donné. Il a en outre perdu sa capacité à exploiter les ressources et n'est donc plus capable de les allouer. Des deux fonctions (sécurité et la gestion des ressources) doivent être impossibles à remplir à une période suffisamment longue (Zartman, 1995) ». Généralement la période retenue pour mesurer le degré d'effondrement de l'État en crise est d'un an.

De ce fait dans notre analyse, nous nous référons aux États africains effondrés à la suite d'un conflit ethnique. Ainsi, il s'avère indispensable dans un premier temps d'identifier les causes des conflits ethniques en Afrique (I), ce qui permettra d'analyser ensuite les implications de l'ONU en amont et en aval dans le processus de rétablissement de la paix dans les États africains effondrés (II).

I. L'identification des causes liées à l'implosion des conflits ethniques en Afrique

Pour mieux cerner les implications de l'ONU dans le maintien de la paix et le processus de consolidation des États africains en crise, les études polémologiques prévoient avant tout les théories et les paradigmes d'analyse des conflits politiques à résonance ethniques.

A. Les causes profondes liées aux processus de formation de l'État en Afrique L'analyse des causes des conflits ethniques en Afrique nous amène à nous interroger sur la considérable difficulté d'adaptation du modèle étatique occidental aux conditions spécifiques de l'émergence de l'État en Afrique (Ozquery-Vidrovitch, 1983). Plusieurs chercheurs ont tenté d'établir des liens de causalité entre les facteurs endogènes et exogènes. Ils vont dans le processus de l'effondrement de l'État en Afrique l'œuvre de l'imposition du modèle étatique occidental et le rôle crucial du colonisateur dans l'institutionnalisation de l'imaginaire politique selon lequel en Afrique le pouvoir d'un individu appartient à son groupe ethnique ou à son clan. Ils voient dans l'institutionnalisation de cet imaginaire, l'implosion des crises identitaires et par là, des conflits ethniques. Cette construction de l'imaginaire s'opère à travers les divages ethniques qui existent entre les différents segments communautaires qui vivent sur un même espace. Mais plusieurs recherches se sont focalisées sur les facteurs internes et externes qui alimentent les conflits. Pour ce, les états-nomades-universalisés voient dans les sources de conflits ethniques, le rôle de la rente dans l'alimentation des conflits. Cette théorie privilégie le comparatisme, les indicateurs normés pour cerner les motivations des organisations criminelles qui opèrent impunément dans les États africains en conflit. Ils dénoncent également l'avidité des mouvements rebelles dans le pillage des ressources naturelles. De ce fait, ils pensent qu'il est plus facile à un pays riche et en hydrocarbures de devenir le théâtre des conflits internes qu'un autre pays dépourvu de ces mêmes ressources (Hugon, 2009). On voit par là, les problèmes posés par la détoxication du diamant en Sierra Leone et la régionalisation du conflit dans le fleuve Mano (Côte d'Ivoire, Guinée et Libéria). Cette approche est utilisée par les experts de la Banque mondiale notamment Paul Collier dans l'identification des sources des conflits internes et l'évaluation des risques d'investissement économique dans les États en faillite. Une seconde approche concerne l'importance de la géopolitique. Les tenants de cette approche géopolitique déclinent en matière de politique étrangère, le rôle primordial des puissances étrangères, les réseaux mafieux et transnationaux et les stratégies des acteurs privés dans l'insertion de l'économie internationale criminalisée. Les tenants de cette approche, Sambanis et Doyle ont étudié les effets de médiation d'une conflictualité à une autre. Ils concluent qu'un pays est enclin à être en conflit si ses voisins connaissent des conflits internes. Les conflits ethniques du Burundi et du Rwanda ont connu des embrasements suite à l'assassinat des deux présidents d'origine Hutu en 1994. D'un autre côté, la théorie anthropologique-politique par sa focalisation sur elle analyse l'importance des spécificités de terrain, des arrangements entre acteurs, le jeu des élites néo-patrimoniales dans le développement des logiques de capture des rentes nationales. Pour les théories de l'étatologie politique, elles analysent les conflits ethniques sous l'angle des facteurs écologiques qui engendrent la guerre environnementale (Fockoua, 1996). La conjonction de toutes ces théories permet de mieux analyser les causes des conflits ethniques en Afrique même s'il est vrai que tous les États africains n'ont pas connu les mêmes enjeux sociaux-politiques.

Les conflits ethniques qui ont lieu en Afrique trouvent également leur origine dans l'existence des frustrations individuelles et collectives des groupes sociaux (Herbst, 2000). Le problème fondamental en ce qui concerne le Burundi et au Rwanda réside dans l'absence de partage du pouvoir entre les différents segments communautaires. Chaque clan qui a le pouvoir privilégie les siens en ignorant les règles de gouvernance. Au Burundi et au Rwanda par exemple, cette situation a été rendue possible grâce à la complicité du colonisateur. Dans ces deux pays, la colonisation a contribué au renforcement du divage ethnique. Les musulmans ont été les premiers à être promus par le colonisateur, ce qui les a permis d'accéder aux études et à la gouvernance. Quant aux hutus et les peuples composés d'arabes et de swahilis, ils sont assignés à des activités subalternes. Les missionnaires catholiques et protestants à l'instar du Congo belge n'ont pas permis à d'autres composantes de la société burundaise et rwandaise d'aller à l'école. Au Tchad, de même si la situation s'est présentée à veuler les populations du Sud. Elles sont les premières à être colonisées par le colonisateur, ce qui les a permis d'être scolarisées à travers le rapport aux populations du Nord majoritairement musulmans. Au Rwanda, lorsque le général Hutu, Juvénal Habyarimana accède au pouvoir en 1973, son souhait de favoriser les siens en imposant des quotas dans l'attribution des bourses scolaires et l'allocation des ressources de l'État a suscité une frustration généralisée de la part des musulmans. Des comportements paritaires entraînent des complications dans la gestion des biens et services publics de l'État rwandais et le détournement de ces fonctions régaliennes au détriment du groupe ethnique Hutu.

En Côte d'Ivoire, après que le président Félix Houphouët-Boigny eut voulu faire de la Côte d'Ivoire un pays émergent, il déclara dès 1970 que la terre appartenait désormais à celui qui la mettrait en valeur. Cette politique entraîna une forte migration de populations sahéliennes. Mais vu l'évolution du poids démographique, la montée du chômage, le verrouillage de la constitution par certains leaders du Nord, et la difficile relation de l'État entre les divers segments communautaires, la Côte d'Ivoire va connaître les problèmes complexes tels que l'attribution de la nationalité ivoirienne aux populations migrantes installées depuis des décennies sur son sol (Touabor, 2002). Le reste des groupes sociaux qui sont exclus dans l'attribution de la nationalité ivoirienne vont même en cause l'ordre politique. Ils vont se rallier à la cause des mouvements rebelles pour renverser les gouvernements sudistes. On peut dire que dans les pays où surgissent les conflits internes violents, il existe une corrélation entre la difficile gestion des crises politiques et l'implosion des conflits internes qui conduisent généralement à l'effondrement de l'État en Afrique. En termes ethniques, tous les États africains qui connaissent des conflits ethniques souffrent de ce problème de cohésion sociale, de gouvernance, de partage des ressources nationales entre les différents composantes de la société (voir Tableau 1).

Mais ces crises identitaires naissent et prennent de l'ampleur lorsque les besoins de sécurité, de l'identité du groupe, de la participation des autres composantes de la société aux affaires de l'État ne sont pas protégés par les institutions fortes et imparciales (Déléme, 2004). En Côte d'Ivoire, la création de l'ivoirité est une pure imagination politique entretenue par les élites bicolores pour écarteler quelques hommes politiques du Nord très influents. Cette manipulation des institutions de l'État ivoirien pour privilégier les siens a entraîné la prise de conscience et la mobilisation de la plupart des élites du Nord derrière les mouvements rebelles. Il est vrai que la manipulation des institutions électorales pour privilégier les siens n'est pas uniquement l'apanage de la Côte d'Ivoire. Tous les États africains souffrent de ces problèmes de cohésion nationale, d'ethnicisation des partis politiques, de manipulation des institutions de la République à travers les mesures de discrimination dans le recrutement de la fonction publique, de l'armée, de la police, dans les grandes écoles de formation, etc. Il se produit une crispation identitaire née de la frustration individuelle et collective des groupes marginalisés. Or, pour tous les hommes aspirent à l'amélioration de leur condition de vie, en ce sens la mobilisation des siens pour garantir la sécurité, la participation et l'identité du groupe social est un véritable défi pour les acteurs politiques. En conséquence, la plupart des systèmes politiques africains qui ont tenté de nier ou réprimer ses besoins humains ont fini par connaître les hécatres des conflits internes ou des proscriptions violentes.

Malgré tout, tous les systèmes politiques africains qui connaissent l'existence de divisions ethniques n'ont pas connu les conflits ethniques ni l'effondrement de leur structure étatique. Il est évident que sans la manipulation des référents identitaires pour des raisons alimentaires et idéologiques, la pression ethnique ne peut aboutir à conduire aux conflits ethniques.

B. La politisation et manipulation du référent ethnique, révélatrice de conflit ethnique

Engagés comme la plupart des pays africains dans un processus irréversible de libéralisation politique, la Côte d'Ivoire, le Burundi, et le Rwanda dans une moindre mesure continuent de s'enliser dans des querelles ethno-régionalistes. Vu le contexte global d'ethnicisation de la vie politique en Afrique subsaharienne, la démocratie a été mal appréhendée par la plupart des élites politiques africaines. Les élites politiques, au lieu de proposer de véritables programmes de sociétés aux populations locales se sont réappropriées du tribalisme. Si dans quelques États africains, le processus démocratique amorcé depuis 1990 a connu une certaine libéralisation douce des régimes autoritaires et monopolistiques, cela n'est pas le cas dans certains États qui connaissent encore des conflits ethniques. L'ethnicité en Afrique a été appréhendée pendant longtemps comme un cadre d'identification des groupes sociaux partageant un même territoire. Elle demeure jusqu'à nos jours l'identité propre des groupes sociaux en raison de leur histoire, de leur culture et de leur système politique traditionnel. Dans presque tous les pays africains, l'administration coloniale a fait un travail d'inventaire et de classement des populations (Déléme, 1992). En Côte d'Ivoire par exemple, ce travail d'inventaire

Classe les Bédés au bas de l'échelle sociale. Cette imagination entretenue par les organisations politiques s'explique par le jugement négatif porté à l'égard de cette population en raison de leur hostilité vis-à-vis du projet colonial. Le Front Populaire Ivoirien dès sa création, s'est toujours appuyé sur la mobilisation des Bédés pour réclamer auprès de l'État postcolonial la participation des Bédés et des groupes apparentés aux affaires publiques. D'après Bamba Dramane « les signifiants ethniques deviennent véritablement opérationnels, ils se chargent du sens qui émane de cette structuration inégale de la société ivoirienne, manipulés par l'État colonial, ils deviennent les figures centrales d'une société ivoirienne en proie à des médias en terme d'émulation » (1995). De ce fait, l'ouverture démocratique constitue un appoint important pour les hommes politiques africains d'attiser la haine ethnique pour bénéficier d'une aura internationale. L'État étant faible, ils mobilisent les segments ethniques qui leurs sont favorables contre le pouvoir central. Ils sont appuyés le plus souvent par la diaspora et les entreprises privées qui cherchent à préserver leurs intérêts en Afrique, une fois que ceux-ci arrivent au pouvoir. Ces organisations politiques ou rebelles cherchent à renforcer la cohésion de leurs groupes en limitant également le recrutement des jeunes au sein de leur fratrie à un seul groupe ethnique au sein duquel on choisira les chefs (Banque Mondiale, 2005). Cela revient à manipuler le référentiel ethnique comme le font les monarchies postcoloniales africaines. Dans le cas du Congo-Kinshasa en République démocratique du Congo, la rébellion Kwilu impliquait les amis Mbunda et pendant, tandis que le mouvement insurrectionnel dirigé par le chef rebelle Laurent Kabila en 1996 et 1997 avait recruté ses premiers combattants auprès des Banyamulenge, les Luksis d'origine rwandaise. Les Banyamulenge sont un groupe ethnique rwandophone vivant dans l'Est de la RDC depuis des décennies, dans la province du Sud-Kivu dans la zone proche avec le Burundi. Ce groupe ethnique souffre de différents régimes politiques congolais. Dès 1981, le gouvernement de Mobutu a décidé de renier la nationalité congolaise aux Banyamulenge. Lorsque le multipartisme fut annoncé, tous les hommes politiques promettent à ce groupe ethnique de se ranger de leur côté à fin de pouvoir les offrir la nationalité congolaise. L'implication du Rwanda dans le conflit interne en RDC pour défendre ce groupe Luksis constitue une manipulation de l'ingénierie étrangère afin de capter les rentes de l'État congolais (Ela Ela, 2006). Ces opérations de purification ethnique sont motivées le plus souvent par une haine de problèmes essentiellement politiques et mobilisation identitaire sur un critère ethnique et xénophobe, son rôle politique et administratif des zones jugées vitales, la erreur politique contre l'opposition et les segments communautaires sensés la soutenir. L'amplification du référentiel ethnique procède en grande partie de ce développement des relations de proximité ou de distance par rapport au pouvoir central, principal agent de l'accumulation-redistribution des rentes de l'État et de la politisation des segments communautaires est un facteur de division et de cristallisation de ces identités ethniques autour de puissants barons et de leaders de mouvements criminels (Baro, 2001). L'exalation du référentiel ethnique devient également un appoint important et utilisé le plus souvent par les organisations criminelles pour revendiquer l'accès au centre politique. Au Mali, la quesnique un territoire qui lui est propre, au mépris des réalités migratoires et des libertés fondamentales, les larves des conflits ethniques dans cette logique deviennent inévitables.

Un clivage qui divise le Nord et le Sud a entraîné la mobilisation des Touaregs au profit de leur identité appelée AZAWAD¹. Les différents mouvements rebelles du Nord-Mali ont toujours prétendu défendre les intérêts du Nord en construisant leur discours politique au profit de leur identité, leur besoins de sécurité, d'autonomie, de développement et de participation dans les affaires publiques. Pour légitimer leurs actions politiques sur la scène internationale, les chefs d'organisations rebelles ont souvent recouru aux griefs formulés quotidiennement par les populations locales dans les zones désertifiées (voir Tableau 2) (Barraud, 2005).

Ainsi, lorsque le discours politique est ainsi pénétré de références xénophobes, voire d'appels à la purification ethnique, le régionalisme assigne à chaque identité ethnique

Faite à toutes ces manipulations des référents ethniques susceptibles de conduire aux conflits ethniques ou dans certains cas l'on engendré, l'ONU donne le principe principal est le maintien de la paix et la sécurité internationales s'implique en amont dans la diplomatie préventive et le rétablissement de la paix. Mais, ces implications ne consistent pas une autre mission universaliste du monde occidental sur les États en faillite? La consolidation de la paix après la négociation des accords de paix dans les pays en conflit implique donc l'importation du modèle de reconstruction démocratique dans les États effondrés. Une telle entreprise nécessite la prise en compte des revendications de différentes identités ethniques dans l'élaboration des mécanismes de gestion de la transition de la guerre civile à la démocratie (Lijphart 1984).

II. Les implications de l'ONU dans le processus de rétablissement de la paix en Afrique Déjà dès 1945 sur les fondements de la SDN, L'ONU œuvre à travers plusieurs mécanismes dans la préservation de la paix internationale. En ce qui concerne le maintien de la paix et de la sécurité internationale, cette mission a été confiée au Conseil de sécurité en vertu de l'article 11 de la Charte des Nations Unies.

A. Le rôle de l'ONU face aux réactions internes et externes de l'échec étatique

L'existence de conflits ethniques nécessite plusieurs approches de solutions. L'ONU dispose dans ce domaine plusieurs mécanismes de prévention et de rétablissement de la sécurité dans un État en crise. Lorsqu'un conflit éclate, le Conseil de sécurité qui dispose d'une série de mécanismes politiques et institutionnels en vertu de la Charte des Nations Unies (art 24) déploie premièrement le mécanisme de diplomatie préventive qui se résume à l'envoi des experts politiques sur le terrain. Ce mécanisme, selon Boutros Ghali, « a pour objectif d'éviter que des différends ne surgissent entre les parties, d'empêcher qu'un différend entre les parties ne se transforme en conflit ouvert et, si un conflit éclate, de faire en sorte qu'il s'étende le moins possible » (Bertrand, 1997). Le Conseil de sécurité s'engage dans ces cas dans l'identification de facteurs endogènes et exogènes qui ont conduit à l'éclatement du conflit ethnique. Lorsqu'il constate une violation flagrante des droits de l'homme et l'intégrité de l'État à protéger les populations, il réagit. La Charte des Nations Unies a confié au Conseil de sécurité la responsabilité dans la qualification des faits « en cas de menace contre la paix, de rupture de la paix et d'acte d'agression » en vertu du Chapitre VII. Dans le cas des conflits internes, le Conseil de sécurité prend des mesures contraignantes dont le respect s'impose aux États et aux acteurs privés dans le conflit. Ces mesures sont motivées par la gravité des faits relatifs aux violations des droits de l'homme et aux règles du droit internationnel humanitaire. Le rôle de diplomatie préventive se résume entre autre ; il vaut mieux prévenir, apaiser les tensions avant qu'elles ne dégénèrent en conflits. En vertu du Chapitre VI, la Charte des Nations Unies prévoit dans le cas des conflits internes la nécessité de régler pacifiquement les différends entre les forces politiques. À cet effet, l'article 33 de la Charte des Nations-Unies stipule que « les parties à tout différend doivent rechercher la solution par voie de négociation, d'enquête, de médiation, de conciliation, d'arbitrage, de règlement judiciaire, de recours aux organismes régionaux, ou par d'autres moyens pacifiques de leur choix ». Cette disposition est claire dans sa formulation et donne toutes les prérogatives au Conseil de sécurité s'il le juge nécessaire, d'inviter tous les acteurs politiques nationaux (gouvernements, chefs d'organisations rebelles, groupes criminels apparentés aux belligérants, etc.) et régionaux (États, acteurs d'ingérence), et les groupes d'amis (puissances étrangères directement ou indirectement impliquées par l'extension du conflit) d'imposer le règlement des différends par de tels moyens (Kreipe, 2009). Ainsi, avant d'arriver à la médiation et à la négociation entre les différents protagonistes, le Conseil de sécurité mandate des groupes d'experts politiques qui identifient les acteurs impliqués dans le conflit. Par ailleurs, il attend toute autorité, tout organisme, tout groupe et même à la limite, toute personne susceptible de forger le rôle dans le champ social. Cette expertise en amont de la diplomatie préventive conduit à l'institutionnalisation des dispositifs d'alerte et des organes de mise en œuvre des mesures de confiance (organes de sécurisation des acteurs de paix). Le mécanisme d'alerte consiste à la collecte systématique et l'analyse de l'information sur des régions en crise. Le Conseil de sécurité utilise l'alerte en vue d'anticiper le processus d'escalade dans l'intensité du conflit ; de développer des réponses stratégiques à ces conflits et de présenter des options d'actions aux acteurs concernés afin de faciliter la prise de décisions (D'Haegh, 2001).

D'un autre côté, l'ONU à travers son programme PIOMM (Programme Interdisciplinaire de recherche sur les causes des violations des droits humains) estime le plus souvent que l'alerte précoce se situe dans un délai en amont de 6 à 12 mois pour que l'organisation puisse entreprendre des actions requises. Elle suppose qu'au délai de 6 semaines à 6 mois correspond à une alerte donnée à temps, et qu'en dessous de 6 semaines, le temps d'alerte est dépassé et peut correspondre à une situation d'action dans l'extrême urgence (Daziano, 2006). Mais lorsque la médiation tarde et que les acteurs en conflit font fi du droit international des droits de l'homme et aux décisions du Conseil de sécurité, deux mécanismes prévus par la Charte des Nations Unies sont utilisés. Ainsi, pour donner effet aux décisions du Conseil de sécurité, la Charte met à sa disposition deux systèmes de sanctions :

Premièrement, lorsque le Conseil de sécurité constate le non-respect de ses décisions en ce qui concerne la cessation des hostilités, il décide de la rupture partielle ou totale des relations économiques et diplomatiques ainsi que les communications avec l'État visé en vertu de l'article 41 de la Charte des Nations-Unies. L'objectif visé dans ces cas est d'isoler politiquement et économiquement l'État cible et les groupes d'organisations rebelles qui pillent et violent les droits de l'homme pour les amener à ces ser ces comportements fautifs. Ce mécanisme est de plus en plus utilisé dans les conflits armés internes. Il a été appliqué dans le cas des conflits sierra léonais et libérien, entre autres, en ce qui concerne l'interdiction de voyager pour Charles Taylor au Libéria et Foday Sanku en Sierra Leone.

Deuxièmement, lorsque les sanctions non militaires deviennent inefficaces face aux violations de droits de l'homme, aux flux de réfugiés, à l'approbation de l'opinion publique mondiale, et au risque de l'effondrement systématique de toutes les structures de l'État en conflit, le Conseil de sécurité en vertu de l'article 42 de la Charte des Nations-Unies, décide ipso facto de retourner à la force armée pour rétablir la paix et la stabilité. Mais ces sanctions militaires sont de moins en moins utilisées lorsqu'il s'agit des conflits internes car le plus souvent les causes des déchirures sociales tournent autour du partage des ressources de l'État, l'absence d'une justice sociale entre toutes les composantes ethniques de la société. Il utilise de plus en plus les menaces de gel des avoirs économiques des criminels de guerre et d'émettre un embargo sur les armes afin de freiner le conflit. Au-delà de tous ces mécanismes institutionnels et politiques déployés dans les États en conflit internes, l'ONU tend à obtenir une transition politique à travers la signature d'accords de paix entre les différents acteurs (Diez De Velasco Vallejo, 2009). Elle négocie et la signature d'un accord de paix entre les différents acteurs permet de garantir le déploiement rapide des experts civils et militaires en vue de sécuriser les institutions de la transition et la population civile. Il existe dans ce cas un soutien permanent d'encourager le partage du pouvoir entre les différents acteurs politiques qui ont pris les armes et le risque d'effondrement de l'État si le processus de transition politique échoue (voir le Tableau 3).

Mais, du fait que l'ONU insiste pour que les différentes organisations rebelles soient signataires des accords de paix aux côtés des autorités officielles de l'État, cela constitue l'un des indicateurs de l'impuissance relative de l'État et de la reconnaissance explicite de ces mouvements criminels sur la scène internationale. Les mouvements rebelles qui bénéficient d'une reconnaissance internationale à la suite des accords de paix, transforment leurs organisations criminelles en partis politiques. Cette transformation et de leurs organisations en partis politiques même si, elle constitue une violation du droit internationale humanitaire permet l'instauration d'un gouvernement transitionnel et un éventuel retour à la paix. À partir du moment où l'ONU obtient la cessation des hostilités à travers la signature des accords de paix, l'État cesse d'être le seul acteur garantissant et symbolisant la stabilité et la sécurité intérieure. Les mouvements rebelles deviennent dans ce cas de figure un contre-pouvoir forçant une opposition qui peut faire basculer la transition de la guerre civile à la démocratie à leur faveur. Pour ce, on assiste le plus souvent à la cristallisation et à la radicalisation des mouvements rebelles dont la signature des accords de paix de sortie de crise constituent l'insitutionnalisation sous la forme d'un gouvernement dirigé par des guerriers (Sindjoun, 2008). D'où l'idée de sécurisation du processus de paix à travers le déploiement des opérations politico-militaires en vue de rétablir définitivement la paix et la sécurité.

L'aide à la reconstruction de l'État effondré devient une conditionnalité démocratique pour tous les États en faillite. Il ne peut y être autrement car toutes les structures étatiques sont en déliquescence généralisée. Dès lors, ce n'est que l'assistance électorale et aux réformes apportées par le système des Nations Unies permet la désignation des leaders politiques aptes à diriger l'État dans la période de sortie de crise. L'État est incapable de faire face seul aux difficultés sécuritaires et économiques se voyant contraint d'accepter toutes les injonctions des partenaires ethniques et internationaux (Voir Tableau 3).

B. Une assistance limitée face à la restauration de l'autorité de l'État en crise

Le processus de transition de la guerre civile à la démocratie dans les pays en conflits est avant tout une volonté globale de partage du pouvoir qui doit être permise par l'accès à la démocratie et d'autre part garantir ce accès par des institutions fortes et stables. La résolution des problèmes politiques liés au partage du pouvoir, à la participation et à la reconnaissance de l'identité des différents groupes ethniques, a toujours été même car spécifique pour les acteurs politiques la peur d'être éliminés lors de la négociation des accords de paix. Le Conseil de sécurité prend à ces effets les dispositions nécessaires en vue de garantir la sécurisation des accords de paix sensés rétablir la stabilité. Ainsi, si l'on s'en tient à l'index des États effondrés tel qu'élaboré par le « Fund for peace », on peut affirmer qu'il existe une corrélation entre le gouvernement de transition et l'effondrement de l'État suite à un conflit interne (Tableau 3). De fait, le défi à la reconstruction post-conflit est composé de cet index des États effondrés qui compose de nos jours douze indicateurs élaborés par le *Fund for peace*². Il s'agit notamment de : les pressions démographiques montantes ; les mouvements importants de réfugiés et des personnes déplacées ; la mémoire de la revanche des groupes ou la paranoïa collective ; l'exode durable et chronique des ressortissants du pays ; l'inégale répartition du développement économique ; le déclin économique sévère et prononcé ; la criminalisation et l'adéquation de l'État ; détérioration progressive des services publics ; suspension ou application arbitraire de l'État de droit et violation massive des droits de l'homme ; libéralisme et impunité des services de sécurité et des milices privées ; émergence des élites représentatives des factions ; intervention des autres États ou acteurs politiques externes. Ainsi donc, les organisations internationales telles que l'ONU considère les États effondrés comme étant une menace à la paix et à la sécurité internationale. De ce fait, si l'ONU ne fait rien contre le risque de menace à la paix et à la sécurité internationale, les zones touchées par des différences organisationnelles peuvent devenir des sanctuaires de terrorisme, de piraterie, de trafic des stupéfiants et de contrebande. Pour ce, le premier rôle de l'ONU est de garantir la sécurisation de l'État effondré. À partir du moment où les accords de paix ont été signés entre les différents protagonistes, elle déploie une série d'opération politico-militaire pour sécuriser les institutions nées de la transition. Par exemple, dans sa résolution 1861, le Conseil de sécurité a autorisé le déploiement en République Tchad d'une composante militaire de la MINURCAT comprenant au maximum 300 policiers, 25 officiers de liaison, 5200 militaires aussi qu'un effectif approprié de personnel civil.

Faite à la faille systémique de toutes les structures administratives et à l'implosion des structures sociales, le Conseil de sécurité a revu le mandat de ses opérations policières-militaires. Au niveau militaire, le but principal de ces missions onusiennes est de garantir la sécurité du pays et la protection des populations civiles, ce qui passe par le désarmement et la démobilisation et l'incorporation des ex-combattants. La sécurité passe aussi par le renforcement de la gouvernance démocratique qui contribue à jeter les bases du maintien de l'ordre et du développement (Latham, 2001). Pour les Nations Unies, le développement humain peut être freiné dans un pays où l'armée, la police et toutes les instances chargées de la sécurité exercent une emprise sur les institutions démocratiques (PINUD, 2002). C'est pourquoi, elle œuvre sur tout dans les pays sortis de conflits à la séparation de la police de l'armée. Elle réforme des armées nationales et la professionnalisation de la police nationale est confiée à l'UNPOL. Elle contribue progressivement à la sécurité des segments communautaires et au retour de la stabilité politique, à la promotion des droits de l'homme et de l'état de droit au soutien de la paix au niveau régional, etc. Au niveau politique, l'ONU crée dans les États des bureaux des Nations Unies dont le but principal est de soutenir les efforts entrepris aux niveaux national et local en vue de mettre en œuvre les conditions du dialogue politique inclusif. Que ce soit en Côte d'Ivoire, au Libéria, au Soudan, le Conseil de sécurité appuie les dialogues politiques et pousse les acteurs politiques à adopter des réformes économiques, constitutionnelles, institutionnelles, administratives, en vue de pallier aux problèmes qui sont à l'origine des déchirures sociales (Annan, 2009).

Malgré les efforts déployés par l'ONU à travers ses différents organes, la paix reste fragile. La consolidation de la paix ne saurait se faire durablement de l'extérieur. Elle doit impliquer les acteurs internes (ONG, société civile) et régionaux (les médias régionaux, les experts indépendants) et les autres organisations internationales dans l'institutionnalisation des mécanismes de résolution des conflits.

Conclusion

Le processus de transition de la guerre civile à la démocratie par lequel on signifie que l'ordre politique doit se fonder sur une compétition électorale entre les mouvements rebelles transformés en partis politiques et les autres forces politiques dans le cadre d'une formule consociationnelle acceptée, ne peut réussir durablement sans la pression de la communauté internationale. En ce sens, les sanctions onusiennes doivent essentiellement avoir pour but de menacer publiquement les fauteurs de trouble qui tenteraient de reprendre les armes. Deuxièmement, aucun processus transitionnel ne peut réussir effectivement sans l'institutionnalisation de la gouvernance politique, c'est-à-dire l'établissement d'institutions électorales effectives, capable d'assurer la paix, la stabilité, le règne de l'État de droit et le respect des droits fondamentaux de l'homme. Ce processus de transition quoique significative pour la relance économique, engendre une gestion économique reposant sur les principes du marché, y compris le maintien d'un cadre réglementaire réel de l'État avec pour conséquence une séparation acceptable de ses pouvoirs entre l'appareil étatique d'une part et ceux qui sont engagés effectivement dans la production de l'échange d'autre part. Les conditions que l'ONU peut ramener la paix dans les pays post-conflits et favoriser le développement économique.

Convergences et divergences entre la langue générale et le football en tant que générateur des productions discursives

ABSTRACT: Convergences and Divergences between Football Language and General Language

It is common knowledge that sport, as an ever-growing social phenomenon and practice, is an integral part of people's everyday life. Its wide spreading in social environments lead us to wonder about the effects such sports-related language may have on people's manner of speaking and, implicitly, upon the language they speak.

This analysis has as its starting point the hypothesis according to which football language could, by relying on the lexical material of the general language, give rise to a completely particular vocabulary. On the one hand, such vocabulary could be related to the general language, sharing with it common traits, thus emphasizing the common points or the convergences, should there be any. On the contrary, football language could stand out by its own traits from a lexical point of view. The linguistic material thus created could fall under the divergences of this sports-related language.

Thus, this study aims to analyze and clarify, on the one hand, the common points and the distinctions between football language and general language and, on the other hand, what unites and sets them apart at the same time. To answer the question I have posed and in order to create a corpus appropriate to the precise objective I have established, I have taken original articles from primary sources of sports newspapers, paper and online, French and Romanian, like L'Équipe, www.lequipe.fr, www.sport24.lefigaro.fr (for the French corpus) and Gazeta Sporturilor, www.gsp.ro (for the Romanian corpus). Working methodology shall rely on the contrastive analysis of some articles of these newspapers to identify the convergences and divergences in the language.

KEYWORDS: football language, convergence, divergence, sports, general language, contact points

Cadre général

Le sport est un objet social d'envergure et un élément d'une culture largement partagée qui apparaît de plus en plus comme un miroir de nos sociétés. On peut dire qu'il fait partie de la culture d'un peuple car « la notion de "culture" a donc bien évolué en un siècle, passant du domaine purement artistique [...] et philosophique à celui plus général de la vie collective d'un peuple » (Nin, 2010 : 93).

Il est acquis que le sport est un phénomène et une pratique sociale de plus en plus répandus, fait partie intégrante de la vie courante des gens. Sa forte diffusion dans les milieux sociaux ainsi que la dimension expressive et souvent symbolique donne le sport témoigne nous mène à nous interroger sur les effets que ce domaine sportif pourra avoir sur la manière de parler des gens et de façon implicite, sur la langue générale qu'ils parlent.

L'influence de ce langage pèse sur la manière de parler des locuteurs et de ce fait, fait en sorte que le vocabulaire du sport s'intègre également dans la culture langagière de chacun au point que le langage courant est bien des fois parsemé de termes et d'expressions qui témoignent de cette extension.

À ce la s'ajoute également « la séduction » que le sport exerce sur les locuteurs désireux de s'emparer des termes sportifs afin de rendre leur discours plus expressif dans des contextes sans aucun rapport avec l'univers du sport.

Ce qu'il est manifeste, c'est que les termes sportifs font l'objet d'un usage intensif par le grand public et sont de plus en plus répandus dans la langue courante ; néanmoins, les réalisations discursives où l'on emploie les mots du sport n'ont pas, dans la plupart des cas, aucun rapport avec le champ d'activité et de consommation seule pourrait servir de piste pour se pencher sur une observation plus attentive du sport, le football en l'occurrence. Il est pour quoi que l'étude que nous proposons s'intéressera aux niveaux les plus saillants du domaine du sport en tant que générateur de termes, soit le lexique et l'expressivité de ce dernier.

Problématique et objectifs

Cette analyse prend comme point de départ l'hypothèse conformément à laquelle le football pourra en s'appuyant sur le matériel lexical de la langue générale, engendrer un vocabulaire propre et spécifique. D'une part, ce vocabulaire peut avoir accès à la langue générale, par le biais de termes communs, ainsi que par le biais de termes spécifiques communs, ainsi que par le biais de termes spécifiques communs.

À l'inverse, le vocabulaire du football pourra se singulariser par des termes qui lui sont propres, d'un point de vue lexical. Le matériel linguistique ainsi créé peut s'insérer dans les divergences de ce langage du sport.

Il ne faut pas oublier non plus que le lexique du football est à la fois prodigieusement éloquent et suggestif, ces deux caractéristiques pouvant être exploitées au maximum d'effets stylistiques. Il est au locuteur, au commentateur sportif ou à tout un chacun de profiter de toute la richesse stylistique de ce type de vocabulaire pour représenter d'une manière distinctive et pittoresque presque toute production discursive.

Les métaphores sont l'une des procédés mis en jeu dans le langage se servant pour décrire le football ; celui-ci est vu par analogies, par comparaisons qui relèvent de l'imaginaire ou du symbolique. Les limites des analogies et des comparaisons ne s'arrêtent qu'aux limites de l'imagination. Plus l'imagination est libre, plus les métaphores sont en nombre et peuvent dépendre même des productions discursives appartenant aux domaines ou à fait éloignés du domaine sportif.

Il a fait que l'aspect stylistique, à savoir l'expressivité du football au plan langagier bénéficie elle-même d'une analyse au sein de cette étude. L'objectif de cette étude est donc d'analyser et de se mériter au clair, dans un premier temps, sur les points communs et dans un deuxième temps, sur les points distinctifs sur le plan lexical (le vocabulaire) et expressif, entre la langue générale et le football – en analysant que générateur des productions discursives, sur ce qui les unit et les oppose à la fois.

Corpus et méthode de travail

Puisque le sport fait partie de la vie de nombre d'individus et que le langage sportif a presque envahi le langage général, ce dernier emprunte au langage sportif des termes spécifiques, et que l'intérêt pour le sport en tant que partie de la vie sociale des hommes, soit de plus en plus répandu, il existe également une presse sportive, écrite et électronique, qui nous met en contact avec toutes les réalités dans ce domaine et aide à en faire connaître sa terminologie.

En outre, il existe des chaînes de télévision qui diffusent en direct ou en différé, des émissions, des programmes, des commentaires, des matches, tous portant sur l'actualité sportive.

Les questions d'analyses énoncées, on poursuit en faisant tout d'abord appel à l'analyse descriptive d'un corpus formé des quelques articles du langage du football en français et en roumain, pour en identifier les convergences et les divergences langagières.

Pour répondre à la question que je me suis posée et pour constituer un corpus adéquat pour l'objectif précis que j'ai établi, j'ai tiré des articles originaux des sources primaires, comme les journaux sportifs, écrits et virtuels, français et roumains, comme L'Équipe (version papier), <http://www.lequipe.fr>, <http://sport.2.lefigaro.fr>, France Football (version papier), (pour le corpus français) et Gazeta Sporturilor, <http://www.gsp.ro> (pour le corpus roumain), <http://www.prosport.ro>.

Analyse

En vue d'établir une terminologie pour notre recherche, nous amorçons l'analyse par quelques brèves mises au point et définitions préalablement nécessaires concernant les notions de langue générale et langue spécialisée pour qu'on puisse se faire une idée précise de leur emploi.

La langue générale ou commune est « [...] ensemble de règles, d'unités et de restrictions qui font partie des connaissances de la majorité des locuteurs d'une langue [...] » (abrégé, 1998 : 115). Cette définition de la langue générale est largement partagée par un auteur linguistique, comme Pierre Lera, conformément à « Une langue est un système de signes oraux et/ou écrits lié à une histoire et à une culture » (Lera, 1995 : 18)

D'autre part, la question sur la définition de la langue spécialisée est néanmoins née de façon polémique ou bien contradictoire. Cette affirmation appelle quand même quelques remarques. L'une des preuves de cette polémique est la définition de D. Mătreă, selon lequel « Diferența dintre limba comună și aceste limbaje speciale este numai în vocabular, cealaltă aspecte lingvistice, fonetica, morfologia și sintaxa, fiind la fel ca ale limbii comune [...] » [La différence entre la langue commune ces langues spéciales seulement dans le vocabulaire, les autres aspects linguistiques, la phonétique, la morphologie et la syntaxe, é[an]alysés comme ceux de la langue commune] (M[atr]ea, 1978 : 9, apud [h] [i]s, 2001 : 9). Cette position est également partagée par G. Rondeau (1981 : 26), qui est également dans Cuvânt și termen (2001 : 10), qui dit : « Il faut noter que tout l'appareil phono-morpho-syntaxique est sous-jacent aussi bien aux Lsp (langues de spécialité) qu'à la Lc (langue commune). Dans les deux cas on a affaire à des ensembles lexicaux qui constituent des sous-ensembles d'une langue commune. »

À cela s'ajoute la définition suivante par Pierre Lera : « La langue spécialisée est d'abord une langue en situation d'emploi professionnel [...]. C'est la langue elle-même (comme système autonome) mais au service d'une fonction majeure : la transmission des connaissances » (1995 : 21).

Dans un autre registre, le langage sportif peut être considéré comme un sous-ensemble de la langue générale, voire un langage de spécialité, d'après Maria Teresa D'abrè dans La terminologie :

Ce point de vue n'est pas singulier, ce qui est évident faisant l'objet des autres linguistes, tel comme Kokourek (1991a : 12), qui est dans La Terminologie (1998 : 118) : « Pour nous, la langue de spécialité sera une sous-langue de la langue dite naturelle, enrichie d'éléments brachyographiques, à savoir abrégatifs et idéographiques, qui s'intègrent à elle en se conformant à ses servitudes grammaticales ».

Ces caractéristiques sont nécessaires pour le football, en ce qui concerne l'activité sportive elle-même, peut être considéré soit comme ayant un vocabulaire spécialisé – par conséquent le lexique commun de la langue générale dont il se sert pour façonner ses termes spécifiques, soit comme une langue qui a fait des choix. Pour ce qui est de notre opinion, on a arrêté son choix sur la définition conformément à laquelle le sport le football en l'occurrence, n'a qu'un vocabulaire spécialisé, c'est-à-dire en emploi particulier de la langue, qui sert à faire connaître ses réalités spécifiques. Ce choix est justifié par le fait que le sport soit son vocabulaire spécialisé, emploie le système linguistique (la phonétique, la morphologie, la syntaxe) et le lexique de la langue générale dont il s'empare afin de construire ses termes spécialisés, lui étant dépourvu d'un système linguistique distinct, n'ayant donc d'autonomie linguistique.

I. Le football, possède-t-il une langue spécialisée ou un vocabulaire spécialisé ?

Pour essayer de détecter les traits communs ou distincts entre la langue générale et une langue spécialisée, j'aurai comme point de départ trois aspects, à savoir l'aspect linguistique, pragmatique et fonctionnel.

a) Du point de vue linguistique, les caractéristiques phonétiques, morphologiques d'un vocabulaire et les caractéristiques syntaxiques des lexèmes appartenant à la langue générale et à la langue spécialisée sont souvent faiblement distinctes en raison du fait que les langues spécialisées (comme sous-ensembles de la langue commune) n'ont aucune autonomie linguistique qui puisse leur permettre de fonctionner parallèlement ou même en opposition avec le système linguistique de la langue générale.

Exemples :

1. Une dizaine de secrétaires d'État seront nommés dans un délai rapide après le discours de politique générale que prononcera mardi Manuel Valls devant l'Assemblée nationale, a annoncé jeudi 3 avril à la presse l'entourage du premier ministre. La veille, une équipe resserrée de seize ministres de plein exercice a été annoncée sur le perron de l'Élysée. « On veut garder la même philosophie » d'un gouvernement de Coombes a-t-on expliqué de même source¹.
2. Lors d'une interview donnée à la version britannique de Yahoo Movies, Kate Winslet a confié que son nu dessiné au fusain par le personnage de Jack, interprété par Leonardo DiCaprio la poursuit de manière dérangeante. D'ailleurs, le scénario de Titanic le chef d'œuvre réalisé par James Cameron, vieille de dix-sept ans est symbolique de l'idylle amoureuse de l'héroïne rebelle et du jeune aventurier sans le sou².
3. Si le Paris Saint-Germain a en outre pris du galon en remportant mercredi son premier trophée de la Ligue des Champions, il a aussi perdu son plus illustre joueur, Zlatan Ibrahimović, fauché en plein vol peu après l'heure de jeu³.
4. Actuellement engagés en Ligue des Champions et en Ligue Europa, le PSG et Lyon sont les deux seuls clubs français en lice dans une compétition européenne. Si le club de la capitale est en bonne voie pour accéder aux demi-finales de l'après son succès contre Chelsea (3-1), la tâche s'annonce plus ardue pour l'OL, confronté à la Juventus Turin jeudi (21h05 en direct commenté), en quart de finale⁴.

Comme il est bien évident, ces propositions sont distinctes du point de vue linguistique (phonétique, morphologie, syntaxe) parce qu'ils emploient le même système graphique, le même système phonologique, morphologique et syntaxique, bien qu'appartenant aux domaines différents de politique et culturelle (les deux premiers extraits) et sportif (les deux derniers extraits). On peut donc dire qu'il y a des convergences de ces systèmes linguistiques. Ces propositions sont parfaitement compréhensibles par tous les locuteurs sur tous les plans linguistiques, bien que les lexèmes appartiennent au domaine général et au domaine sportif.

L'autre aspect linguistique en examen dans cette analyse, le vocabulaire, mérite lui-même une étude plus approfondie, parce que c'est le vocabulaire spécialisé du football qui donne à ce dernier sa spécificité.

Le football, en tant qu'activité sportive, de même que toute autre activité interhumaine, réclame un appareil conceptuel qui puisse représenter cette activité de manière distincte. Par suite, ayant le même point de départ lexical de la langue générale, défini comme « [...] l'ensemble des unités formant le vocabulaire, la langue d'une communauté, d'une activité humaine, d'un locuteur, etc. » (Dubois et al., 2007 :

282), le football est parvenu à engendrer un vocabulaire en mesure d'expliquer toutes ses réalités particulières. Telles réalités propres au football concernent l'organisation de ce jeu et les acteurs impliqués.

Dans ce cas, le terme de vocabulaire « est d'usage courant dans les études portant sur des corpus spécialisés : vocabulaire de l'aviation, vocabulaire politique, etc. ». Pour R.L. Wagner « le terme de vocabulaire désigne conventionnellement un domaine du lexique qui se prête à un inventaire et à une description » (Dubois et al., 2007 : 508).

Loin de s'en tenir à un inventaire restreint et borné, ce langage est un langage qui donne les termes sonnes représentés langagiers d'un domaine n'est pas au sens strict ou renfermé entre des bornes infranchissables ; bien au contraire, ce domaine d'activité est toujours en plein essor. Un bon nombre des sujets parlants s'inscrivent dans ce sport des dernières années aux catégories sociales diverses et provenant des milieux hétérogènes, caractéristiques qui imposent une certaine spécificité au parler de ce sport. Le football est l'un des éléments de la culture d'un peuple, comme le dit Jean-Lauda Michéa⁵, qui explique que « le football est l'exemple par excellence d'une activité qui relève de la culture et devrait être reconnue comme un phénomène culturel majeure [...] ». Cette idée est confirmée par le fait que « l'adoption de certaines normes et de codes plus ou moins symboliques contribue également à l'intégration des différentes communautés et marque l'appartenance à une culture populaire, revendiquée comme telle⁶ ».

Des points de vue représentés au sein d'arguments à l'appui de l'évolution du lexique du football, de son expressivité, de sa richesse, arguments qui ne cessent pas de se multiplier. Le vocabulaire d'un domaine d'activité est dans un processus évolutif continu et annuel, son développement entraîne le résultat soi-même de l'extension du domaine, soit de l'enrichissement qu'apportent les catégories hétérogènes qui y sont impliquées.

Si l'on considère que le vocabulaire du football, en tant que vocabulaire spécialisé d'un domaine d'activité – tel que celui-ci a été défini ci-dessus – fait partie du lexique de la langue générale et que la langue générale jouisse des procédés d'enrichissement lexical et qui s'appliquent également aux tous les sous-ensembles de la langue, et – inclut les vocabulaires de cette langue, il ressort qu'il existe là une convergence entre la langue générale et le vocabulaire du football. De manière plus lapidaire, ce que le vocabulaire du sport est le lexique de la langue générale par conséquent est l'enrichissement et l'évolution continues.

Toutefois, au niveau de la phonétique, la morphologie et la syntaxe permettent une compréhension des textes sportifs, au niveau du vocabulaire peuvent rendre les propositions incompréhensibles ou peu compréhensibles, en fonction de son degré de spécialisation (ce est à dire selon son éloignement ou rapprochement vers un emploi professionnel strict).

Au sein du vocabulaire spécialisé d'un domaine d'activité, on trouve des éléments communs à la langue générale et au vocabulaire spécifique – ce qui fait que la compréhension d'un texte sportif, aussi qu'éléments spécifiques au vocabulaire du sport soi-même en emploi strictement professionnel, fait que, à l'évidence, l'observateur auquel se heurtent bien des personnes qui en ont entendu le vocabulaire du football, comme le montrent les exemples suivants :

Exemples :

i) vocabulaire commun aux deux types de texte

1. L'Olympique de Marseille a arrêté in extremis un point à Bonal face à S.O. aux (1-1) grâce à un but de N'koulou à la dernière minute. L'OM n'a plus gagné depuis cinq journées⁷.
2. À cinq jours de leur quart de finale aller de Ligue des champions contre Chelsea, les Parisiens ont délivré une prestation solide, malgré l'absence de quatre titulaires (Alex, Maxwell, Verratti et Matuidi) au coup d'envoi⁸.
3. Le coach avait mis ça en place juste avant le match. Il voulait qu'on mette beaucoup de pression sur la défense centrale lyonnaise avec deux ailiers⁹.
4. Dès le début de la rencontre nous avons vraiment bien défendu. On était en place, les Lillois ont eu des difficultés à se créer des occasions, ils ont eu deux frappes en première période, la même chance en deuxième période. Je pense que nous avons eu de notre côté les occasions très nettes¹⁰.

Comme ces exemples montrent, le vocabulaire sportif est compréhensible par tous les sujets parlants car il ne pose pas aux natifs des problèmes de compréhension du sens des mots, ces derniers ayant une fréquence assez élevée.

ii) vocabulaire spécifique du football

5. Perdu dans les couloirs du 4-3-3 aligné en début de saison par [...], l'ailier flambe dans son nouveau rôle de neuf demi ;
6. On l'a vu, voilà. Paris-SG – Monaco, c'est un match digne de la Ligue des champions ;
7. Parce que K.B., souvent rimballé sur les côtés la saison dernière, n'avait plus joué seul en pointe depuis plusieurs années ;
8. Toutela saison, le F.C. SM allait finir avec la descente et faire du yo-yo ;
9. Capable de viser et projeter vers l'avant de transporter les lignes¹¹.

Une analyse des exemples ci-dessus nous mène à conclure que la compréhension globale d'un texte sportif repose, d'une part, sur la spécialisation du lexique en question et d'autre part, sur un minimum de connaissances de spécialité ; plus le lexique est spécialisé, plus on doit faire preuve de connaissances dans le domaine. Le public intéressé au football doit être sairement au courant avec les réalités et avec l'appareil notionnel de ce domaine spécialisé.

b) Les énoncés de la langue générale comportent elles-mêmes un aspect pragmatique qui se trouve dans presque toutes les productions discursives. « La pragmatique linguistique étudie les rapports qui existent entre les énoncés et le contexte extralinguistique dans lequel l'énoncé est prononcé par le locuteur, à savoir sur les éléments du langage qui n'arrivent pas à transmettre l'information complète si on ne connaît pas le contexte de leur emploi [...] » (Costăchescu, 2013 : 2)

Assurément, les mots des langues réelles sportives ne sont pas, eux-mêmes, en mesure d'exprimer des actes de langage, comme un acte de base de la pragmatique. Il n'est pas donc question de pragmatique du vocabulaire du sport, celui-ci étant seulement une partie de la langue générale, se subsumant à celle-ci. On peut parler par ailleurs des énoncés qui comportent un vocabulaire sportif qui se prêtent à un contenu pragmatique et à une analyse pragmatique.

Il s'ensuit que la pragmatique est un point de divergence par rapport au vocabulaire spécialisé du football, de l'aspect de son présent seulement dans le discours sportif.

c) La langue, outre son rôle en communication, est employée pour exercer aussi d'autres fonctions. L'aspect fonctionnel, représenté par les fonctions de la langue, selon Jakobson, est bien manifeste dans la langue générale et comporte une fonction expressive, référentielle, conative, phatique, métalinguistique et poétique.

Si les langues spécialisées favorisent la fonction référentielle et métalinguistique, à savoir d'informer et d'échanger informations sur des sujets spécialisés, la langue générale privilégie et fait valoir autres possibilités comme les fonctions expressive, conative, phatique et poétique. En s'appuyant sur ces fonctions, la communication devient plus personnalisée, les émetteurs s'impliquent personnellement, les récepteurs le font également; il y a dans la langue commune de la narration, du dialogue, des interrogations rhétoriques qui permettent un échange permanent entre les émetteurs et les destinataires. Le message lui-même peut revêtir diverses formes, selon les situations de communication. Les langues spécialisées, par ailleurs, sont dépourvues de subjectivité, elles sont dépersonnalisées.

Si l'on analyse un texte sportif, on sera surpris de l'expressivité du langage employé, de la subjectivité des commentateurs, de l'implication personnelle de celui qui rédige l'article. La fonction expressive est primordiale et occupe une place au jour de laquelle tourne l'article entier. Il y a des cas pour autant où le style impersonnel exprimé par la fonction référentielle et celle métalinguistique se rencontre dans les analyses des matches, les descriptions des faits, les notes des matches et, comme il est évident dans les exemples suivants.

Exemples :

1. 21^e minute: Paye reçoit un ballon devant sa surface, élimine notre remonte quarante mètres avec un quart de notre équipe à jouer et trois solutions possibles: Ribéry à gauche, Valbuena derrière lui et Giroud à droite;
2. 32^e minute: premier corner pour Biélorussie, côté droit, et les Bleus défendent en individuelle, Chahin le sien, avec l'ailier au premier poteau et Giroud en joueur libre aux six mètres¹².

Tous ces éléments viennent de conforter l'option pour un vocabulaire spécialisé d'un domaine d'activité, football en l'occurrence, plutôt que pour une langue spécialisée. Seule l'expressivité des articles et des commentateurs sportifs suffit pour qu'on se rende compte que ces derniers appartiennent à la langue générale et les termes sportifs ne servent que d'un outil qui augmente l'expressivité lorsqu'on s'appuie sur le système linguistique de la langue générale.

Ces conclusions préliminaires ne font que nous conforter dans l'option pour un autre point de vue linguistique à l'égard de ce sport. Le football possède-t-il une langue spécialisée ou un vocabulaire spécialisé ? – la réponse à cette question, compte tenu des arguments présentés, ne peut être que la suivante : le terme ou plutôt le syntagme « la langue du football / le langage du football » doit être rejeté au profit de « vocabulaire spécialisé du football » ou « discours sportif ».

II. L'expressivité du football – en tant que générateur des productions discursives

Le langage, en tant qu'apanage de l'homme de s'exprimer, a une fonction fondamentale dans l'acte de communication parce que c'est par l'intermédiaire du langage que l'homme fait transcrire ses pensées et ses émotions. D'entre les fonctions de la langue, la fonction poétique est celle qui porte fondamentalement sur le message lui-même car, comme presque tout message est expressif, cette fonction prend appui sur les structures intrapersonnelles du message, aussi que sur les structures discursives de celui-ci.

Tous les individus qui communiquent et qui font passer des messages, le font avec l'intention que leurs messages aboutissent aux récepteurs et que leurs messages parviennent à transcrire ce qu'ils ont voulu à exprimer. C'est là où la créativité et l'innovation langagière de chacun interviennent et reflètent d'une manière très éloquent, l'évolution de la langue.

L'efficacité du discours, en ce qui concerne la transmission du message, au sein d'une situation particulière de communication ou d'un contexte donné, repose sur la créativité et l'innovation dont on a fait mention. Ce qui est important est que le message passe. Le locuteur pour autant peut choisir que le message ne reste pas inaperçu et pour ce faire, il fait recours aux moyens par le biais desquels il peut « augmenter l'information, c'est à dire réveiller l'attention des auditeurs » (Ardeleanu & Balazhi, 2005). De tels moyens comme la structuration du message, l'intonation, la tonalité, le rythme, l'ajout de divers déterminants, la prononciation emphatique et son utilisation de procédés employés pour réveiller toute l'attention des auditeurs.

Aux procédés mentionnés s'ajoutent également les figures de style, eux aussi des moyens vers lesquels on se tourne souvent pour renforcer le rendement des énoncés. Une figure de style, d'après Axielle Beth et Elsa Marpeau dans Figures de style (2005), est « un procédé par lequel on agit sur la langue, en mettant en avant ses particularités, afin d'accentuer son efficacité [...] ou en bouleversant, avec plus ou moins de force, son usage courant [...] ».

Les figures de style, eux aussi, comportent plusieurs types de figures, les figures de sens énonciatives sur lesquelles on se penchera dans mon analyse, plus exactement la méaphore, parce que, à l'opposé des figures de mots – qui traitent le signifiant des mots, les figures de sens – appelées aussi tropes – portent sur le signifié des mots.

Bien des fois, certains énoncés ont un sens qui va au-delà du sens de la simple mise en relation des éléments du lexique, si l'on considère leur sens commun, général, littéral. Lorsqu'il y a une modification du sens conventionnel, c'est à dire il y a un sens figuré que l'on attribue à un énoncé, on parle d'une figure appelé trope, qui signifie soit « tour », soit « détour », soit « déournement » du sens. Le trope « est considéré comme un cas particulier affectant le sens des mots dans le discours. Leur sens littéral est relégué à l'arrière-plan des énoncés, au profit d'un nouveau sens discursif (ou figuré) qui en occupe le premier plan » (Bonhomme, 1998 : 7). Le propre d'un trope est donc un transfert de signification.

La métaphore, le trope qui m'intéresse le plus pour les besoins de notre analyse, dont l'étymologie vient de grec meta – suffixe signifiant « changement », phora – action de se porter, se mouvoir), « établit des analogies entre des termes appartenant à des domaines notionnels hétérogènes » (Bonhomme, 1998 : 60) ou, d'après Le Robert pratique, est un « procédé de langage qui consiste dans une modification de sens (terme concret dans un contexte abstrait) par substitution analogique » (2011 : 898). C'est que ces deux définitions partagent, c'est le terme « analogie » qui s'avère la clé de voûte de la métaphore. La preuve en est une autre définition conformément à laquelle « cette figure consiste en un rapprochement de deux réalités distinctes. Il s'agit du remplacement du mot « normal » par un autre mot appartenant à un champ sémantique [...] différent mais tous deux présentant des similitudes. » (Richard Lens-Poulet, 2002 : 61)

Il y a donc des ruptures sémantiques qui interviennent en raison de la fusion de domaines notionnels différents. La métaphore est un processus composé de deux étapes :

- une étape où le sens littéral est neutralisé – le processus de neutralisation intervient parce que le contexte de l'énoncé lui attribue un autre sens
- une deuxième étape où une analogie est activée.

Au cours de la deuxième étape, on cherche des propriétés communes entre les mots métaphoriques ou « phores » et les termes qu'ils caractérisent « thèmes ».

La métaphore est le trope le plus important parce qu'il est largement répandu dans tous les domaines où on se sert du langage pour communiquer ; elle est plus ou moins créative selon les caractéristiques discursives du locuteur (elle met en jeu la subjectivité du locuteur) et selon la situation de communication. À partir de sa créativité, cette figure de style soulève des problèmes portant sur l'interprétation ; elle est d'autant plus difficile à traduire que les analogies qu'elle fait valoir jusqu'à être inaperçues, selon que la rupture d'isotopie est plus ou moins atténuée. Ce problème devient d'autant plus épineux que l'analogie est plus ou moins intégrée dans la culture reçue.

On ne peut pas se passer de la métaphore ; elle est si ancrée dans notre communication, dans notre vie que notre langage sera appauvri sans l'apport d'émotion, d'expressivité et de dynamisme qu'apporte la métaphore ; c'est d'ailleurs la conclusion de George Lakoff et Mark Johnson selon lesquels « [...] la métaphore est partout présente dans la vie de tous les jours, non seulement dans le langage, mais dans la pensée et l'action. Notre système conceptuel ordinaire, qui nous sert à penser et à agir, est de nature fondamentalement métaphorique » (Lakoff & Johnson, 1985 : 13).

Une fois la métaphore présentée brièvement, je me pencherai en suite sur quelques réalisations métaphoriques dans les articles tirés des journaux sportifs.

La métaphore est présente dans presque tout le domaine linguistique. Le sport où la métaphore est employée dans sa plénitude, s'empare de ce procédé pour enrichir l'émotion, l'expressivité, la passion, le dynamisme du football, qualifiés sans lesquelles ce dernier sera appauvri. Le football est un domaine spécialisé et à la fois une ressource inépuisable où la créativité créative et celle langagière des locuteurs sont mises en jeu pour faire ressortir des effets linguistiques et distorsives ou à faire étonner.

Conclusions

Les exemples présentés et analysés dans cette étude, qui ne représentent qu'une partie de la richesse qu'offre le football en tant que générateur de productions discursives, visent à évaluer l'homogénéité linguistique – manifestée sur le plan phonétique, morphologique, syntaxique, etc. – que paragenèse l'appareil conceptuel appartenant à un domaine spécialisé et la langue générale.

Le vocabulaire spécialisé puise profondément dans le lexique de la langue commune afin de créer sa terminologie. D'autre part le football, en raison de son rayonnement dans tous les milieux sociaux, est à dire grâce à sa capacité de pénétration dans tous les niveaux de la langue, a abouti à influencer la manière de parler des gens à tel point que la langue courante est souvent parsemée avec des termes du sport football en l'occurrence, plus ou moins spécialisés. Réciproquement les milieux sociaux aux donnent au football, et au sport en général, des termes eux-mêmes façonnés – par conséquent d'un point de vue expressif et symbolique – par les communautés linguistiques auxquels ils appartiennent.

On doit s'attendre sur le fait que cela ne pourra point s'accomplir sans une similitude, voire convergence du système linguistique en question, de sorte que le vocabulaire spécialisé, ou la langue spécialisée en emploi par conséquent, quel que soit la dénomination employée, puisse s'intégrer aisément dans la langue générale. Les conclusions qu'on est amené à tirer, en s'appuyant sur les similitudes linguistiques, ne font que confirmer la convergence de la langue générale qui s'étend sur ses sous-ensembles, et inclus le lexique et le vocabulaire et implicitement le vocabulaire spécialisé que représente le football.

En outre, en vertu de ces conclusions et de même une observation supplémentaire, on esquisserait de remplacer la notion de « langue ou langage du football » avec celles de « discours sportif », « vocabulaire (spécialisé) du football » ou « football en tant que générateur des productions discursives ».

ABSTRACT: Rules of good manners and courtesy in Catalan Facet (14th century)

Every society produces a reflection upon its own social norms. These are behaviour models adopted by a society or by a group, and they need a long-term learning of social codes. The medieval era isn't an exception. The Catalan "facet" is a prose text dealing manners and courtesy rules for knights and middle classes; sort of Ovid's work's popularization containing a mix of troubadour's tradition of courteous love and pieces of advice upon official and good behaviour available. We are going to analyse the different narrative materials helping its elaboration; besides, we're going to examine the "facet" as an "ars amatoria" defining the good lover's features.

Au XII^e siècle le genre littéraire des traités de savoir-vivre était véritablement, particulièrement sous l'influence des Distiques du Pseudo-Dion, sorte de manuel de morale destiné à l'enseignement imposé au III^e siècle². Un nombre important de traités, les plus connus étaient ceux de Pierre Alphonse ou d'Hugues de Saint-Victor même si ceux-ci ne sont pas directement reliés au savoir-vivre, de poèmes en latin et en langues vulgaires qui permettent de mémoriser avec facilité les normes de comportement qui leur sont alors largement³. que ces nouvelles règles virent plus le jour dans les établissements monastiques⁴, les écoles cathédrales⁵ et dans les cloîtres, et qu'ensuite elles furent reprises et largement diffusées par les laïcs⁶. Elles ne seraient pas nées dans les cloîtres printiers non plus qu'à l'interprétation classique de Norbert et Elias⁷. Ensuite, ces écrits vont irriguer le domaine de la littérature de savoir-vivre et certains vont être repris, réimprimés, augmentés et traduits dans différents pays lors des siècles suivants. Parmi eux on peut citer trois manuels en vers datés du XII^e siècle et qui possèdent comme titre « Le Courtois » : le Facetus Cum nihil utilius, le Facetus Moribus et Vita et l'*Urbanus Magnus*⁸. Les deux poèmes qui portent le titre de Facetus ont connu un grand succès, tant en latin qu'en langues vernaculaires⁹. Ils s'inscrivent dans une féconde période d'inventions et de progrès dans les domaines de la littérature mais également de réflexion éthique, théologique, philosophique et d'un essor important de l'éducation des laïcs en latin et de plus en plus en langues vulgaires. En effet, toute société possède des normes sociales qui sont des « modèles culturels de conduite adoptés par un groupe ou une société, légitimés par des valeurs partagées jusqu'à un certain point, et dont les mœurs sont la dimension pratique »¹⁰. Dans ce domaine, le cloître n'est jamais laissé à l'écart de "nature". Quel que soit le groupe ou la communauté, que ce soit le lieu ou le territoire considérés, l'enveloppe corporelle subit des modifications importantes. De même, l'homme social interiorise dès son plus jeune âge des règles et des codes de comportement qui le façonnent, le construisent et lui permettent de s'intégrer pleinement dans la société. Le cloître est un produit culturel sans cesse remodelé et il se doit d'acquiescer des "techniques". Chaque culture installe ses valeurs, ses croyances, ses canons esthétiques dans le corps, dans un système de savoir-vivre qui repose sur des critères comme l'amabilité, la modération, la dignité, la sobriété... Le sociologue Dominique Pizard en a dénombré plus de cent¹¹.

Ainsi en esquil du facet catalan, forcément inspiré du lexique didactique Moribus et vita déjà enlevu¹². Influencé par Ovide et très largement diffusé en Europe occidentale, Moribus et vita est l'un des exemples les plus frappants de la réception d'Ovide comme praeceptor amoris dans la littérature latine du XIIe siècle. En effet, au cours de cette époque le naïf de Sulmone s'élève au rang d'auteur scolaire et se s'deux célèbres poèmes didactiques, l'Ars amatoria et les Remedia amoris commencent à figurer au programme des écoles¹³. Ils furent utilisés occasionnellement dans celles-ci au moins jusqu'au XVe siècle¹⁴, voire jusqu'aux années 1520 en Angleterre¹⁵. Par conséquent à partir du facet catalan, nous voyons de manière en relief les divers matériaux narratifs qui ont contribué à son élaboration et de tracer sa spécificité dans l'ensemble de la littérature didactique et morale de cette époque.

gracieux et de plaisant¹⁷ prend au cours du Moyen Âge le sens de bien élevé et de courtois¹⁸. Il est un synonyme de curialis et d'urbanus qui s'oppose à *rusticitas*¹⁹. Au XII^e siècle, le premier poème en latin qui traite des bonnes manières porte le nom de Doctrina Magistri Joannis Faceti. Il devint le modèle pour toute la littérature ultérieure de savoir-vivre et Mary Theresa Brennan rappelle que rapidement le mot facetus ne désigna plus seulement le poème de Magistri Joannis mais également tous les textes qui font référence à ces traits de bonne conduite²⁰.

En 1192, le canonique et évêque de Ferrare Huguccio de Pise explique ce mot dans le lexique Liber derivationum par l'étymologie « facetus quasi favens coetus » (« qui favorise les assemblées, c'est-à-dire la sociabilité »)²¹. A un an de distance de 1480, l'archevêque italien Nicolo Perotti, professeur de philosophie et de poétique à l'université de Bologne, offre dans son ouvrage sur la langue latine, Cornucopiae, la définition suivante : « Item a Fando factus est hoc elegans in dictando & delicias quasdam sermonis habens quae facticiae dicitur a quo factus est adverbium hoc est exculat eleganter ; urbane » reprise par exemple à l'identique dans l'édition de 1552 du Polyanthea (1503) de l'italien Domenico Nanni Mirabelli²². Plus près de nous, au XVII^e siècle, Charles du Fresne définit ainsi facetus dans Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis : « Urbanus, bonis artibus et studiis exornatus »²³. En 1879, B. Hauréau en donne une définition toute à fait juste et claire : Facetus « veut dire, non pas le badin, le fatéieux, mais l'honnête homme, le galant homme, qui mène une vie régulière, convenable et pratique les usages de la bonne compagnie »²⁴.

À partir du XII^e siècle, le mot facetus, devient le modèle de tous les écrivains français et le mot emprunté aussi bien en latin que dans les langues vulgaires europécennes. Le facet n'était pas rédigé à l'attention des chevaliers expérimentés, mais pour les jeunes pages ou les écuyers et destiné à être appris par cœur par les « nobles, vilains et clercs et lay »²⁵. Il s'agit d'une somme d'aphorismes, c'est-à-dire de sentences énoncées en peu de mots, sur les bonnes manières de se tenir en société, notamment à table mais pas seulement on s'en sert pour l'investigation et beaucoup plus large et varié.

Le facet désigne spécifiquement deux poèmes didactiques latins dans la continuation de ses Disticha Catonis qui en représentent de ses suppléments dans l'enseignement scolaire et mondain de l'époque. Le premier, Cum nihil utilius, est un manuel de courtoisie qui compte un peu plus de 250 hexamètres rimés à l'usage des rudes (v. 5) ou des débutants c'est-à-dire des personnes mal dégrossies, mal polies à l'égal des paysans et il donne des conseils sur la conduite à adopter, en particulier à table²⁶. Il se situe également dans la tradition des Disticha de Dion (v. 5). D'autres manuscrits l'attribuent à un maître Jean, magister Iohannes. Il date sans doute de la seconde moitié du XII^e siècle²⁷. Il a fait l'objet de quatre adaptations en français en les XIII^e et XV^e siècles : « D'haïons qui fu moult aïges hom » le plus connu (XIII^e siècle), « Qui de translater s'en treme » (XIII^e siècle), « Miculx vauld assamblar un tresor » (XIV^e siècle) dans lequel les sentences de table sont amplifiées, « Tu dois a Dieu requerre paradis » (XV^e siècle). Les traductions du Facetus en hexamètres étaient populaires en France fin du Moyen Âge. Les adaptations et nombreux emprunts effectués par les enseignements en français en font foi²⁸.

Le second, Moribus et vita, en distiques élégiaques, utilisés pour des sentences morales, également connu comme le facetus d'Aurigena²⁹ du nom de son auteur supposé, poème versifié en latin qui comprend 25 distiques soit 510 vers, est plus raffiné et s'adresse à un jeune homme qui veut conquérir le cœur d'une dame³⁰. Il se situe dans la mouvance néo-ovidienne³¹. La moitié du poème est consacrée à la bonne conduite dans le domaine de la conquête amoureuse (v. 131-384). Daté des années 1130 ou 1140 d'après Peter Dronke et composé d'après lui dans le sud-ouest de l'Allemagne³², sa plus ancienne référence eslatinsible dans Der heimliche Bote, rédigé selon toute vraisemblance dans les années 1170-1180³³. Il fut très diffusé en Europe occidentale et traduit en français dans le dernier quart du XIV^e siècle sous le titre « D'hiex qui voel failis devenir »³⁴ et en catalan sous le titre de « Fassek ».

Bien que l'unique manuscrit du Facet catalan date des années 1400, Rosanna D'Anavella situe sa rédaction dans la première moitié du XIV^e siècle³⁵, mais Alfred Morel-Faïo dans la seconde moitié du siècle³⁶ et Jacques Joseau au mi-temps du XIV^e siècle³⁷. Le Facet catalan fut édité pour la première fois par Alfred Morel-Faïo en 1886 et cette édition donna lieu immédiatement à de nombreux commentaires tels ceux d'Alfred Mussafia et Emile Lévy³⁸. En 1912, Lluís Faraudo livra une nouvelle édition³⁹. Une version récente a été proposée en 1991 par Francesc Ziino⁴⁰. Enfin, en 2013, Rosanna D'Anavella édita une version annotée du texte latin⁴¹.

B. Un Ars amandi

Le poème connu sous le nom de facet de Calan est donc un long poème de 1743 vers en catalan, daté du XIV^e siècle. Il s'agit d'une vulgarisation pseudo-ovidienne, dont la métrique est en noves rimades, c'est-à-dire en octosyllabiques à rimes plates. La forme versifiée doit favoriser la mémorisation. Le manuscrit original, MS 381 (anciennement n° 377), est conservé à la Bibliothèque Municipale de Carpentras⁴². Il occupe les folios 223r-242r. ; originellement, il faisait partie d'un codex de 46 folios (n° 487 du fond espagnol, anciennement Libri 11) de la Bibliothèque Nationale de France⁴³. Il présente un ample et hétérogène recueil de textes narratifs en vers, datables à la deuxième moitié du XVI^e siècle⁴⁴.

Dans ce recueil, le facet coexistait avec d'autres textes très divers et des petits poèmes classés dans la tradition troubadour de l'amour courtois (poemetti), comme le Salut d'amor et le Conte d'amor ; des textes ironiques et satiriques, tels la Disputació d'en Buc ab son cavall, le Libre dels mariners et le Planys del cavaller Matarò ; des noves rimades d'inspiration didactique et allégorique (Faula, L'arnes de cavaller), voire religieux (Cobles, Corpus Christi, Lausor de la Divinitat). La variété des textes a des racines de la richesse des motifs et des influences culturelles qui animent la production littéraire catalane à l'époque du règne de Pierre IV d'Aragon (1336-1387) et de son successeur Jean I^{er} (1387-1396).

Quoique anonyme, le facet fut probablement rédigé par un locuteur catalan en Espagne. Comme l'indique le titre, ce poème s'adresse à quelqu'un qui aspire à devenir facetus, c'est-à-dire une personne « urbaine, courtoise, polie »⁴⁵, et il expose les règles du bon comportement utiles dans toutes les circonstances de la vie. ⁴⁴ Il faut rappeler que certains textes ne datent pas le XIV^e siècle, et qu'il est difficile de les classer chronologiquement : Faula (Torroella), Lausor de la Divinitat (Aymò de Vestrars), Arnès del cavaller (Marta), Cobles, Corpus Christi et l'œuvre de Turmeda ont été composés entre 1365 et 1395 ; Romans dels set savis paraît plus archaïque et date en XIII^e siècle ; Stòria de l'amat Frondino e de Brisona date de la première moitié du XV^e siècle. Les manuscrits signalés 381 et Esp. 48 datent d'environ 1430.

Antonio Maravall lui a associé trois caractéristiques : la nécessité pour le jeune homme d'apprendre et de mesurer en pratique un savoir véritablement odifié ; l'acquisition de normes et de comportements sociaux externes ; la culture des qualités et des vertus individuelles⁴⁶. Dans le facet, ces concepts de courtoisie sont entendus comme « art de vie et de penser » (v. 245) c'est-à-dire un comportement qui manifeste par les "convenances extérieures du corps" (externum corporis decorum).

Alfred Morel-Faïo et Louis Faraudo l'ont même considéré comme un poème didactico-érotique et Morel-Faïo le décrit même un « manuel du parfait séducteur »⁴⁷, bref un Ars amandi ovidien qui vient de la discipline mondaine, du livre de civilité et bien entendu de l'art d'aimer. Mais pour quoi il préfère l'appellation de Livre de courtoisie. Pour Faraudo c'est un traité d'urbanité et un Ars amatoria. Le caractère « superficiel et frivole » de ce traité de courtoisie mondaine met en scène des aventures amoureuses qui s'adressent aux jeunes nobles de l'époque⁴⁸. Par contre, Amédée Pagès le considère même un enseñamen de cortezia, qui expose « les préceptes de la morale individuelle ou sociale ou les vérités de la religion », idée que l'on doit forcément nuancer, et il le rapproche de productions catalanes telles que l'Harnois du Chevalier de Pere March ou Lausor de la Divinitat de d'Aymon de Desars, où l'influence des courants français et provençaux est très sensible⁴⁹. Plus récemment Jordi Rubió, suivant l'approche herméneutique d'abord proposée par Morel-Faïo et Faraudo, a qualifié le Facet de « manuel de stratégie amoureuse », ce qui semble plus juste⁵⁰. Pour sa part Francesc Ziino, qui en a livré une nouvelle traduction, le définit lui-même un type de comédie législative en vogue au XIV^e siècle⁵¹.

C. La composition du facet

Ce poème didactique est un bréviaire qui s'adresse à tous les états de la société à l'instar du *Moribus et vita*⁵². Il offre des préceptes sur la conduite à bien observer dans différentes circonstances en insistant sur les devoirs des plus jeunes comme des vieillards, une originalité du texte, et il passe en revue le chevalier, le bourgeois et le marchand (vv. 13-15). Une grande partie des membres de la société est appelée à se conformer à la courtoisie afin d'être « bien éduqué(e) et versé(e)

On peut reprendre la réflexion de Riça Beyers qui s'applique à Moribus et Vita : « le facetus est tel ui qui es. l'ui livé, qui se conduit en homme du monde, en homme aussi qui connaît sa place dans le monde »⁵³. Des motifs reviennent à plusieurs reprises dans le lex / fasset s'oppose à « mal ensenyé » (mal éduqué) (v. 46), le verbe « amesuré » (v. 41) renvoie vers la conduite agréable et modérée, l'adjectif « bona mesura » (v. 95) vers la discipline intérieure, la modération, l'humilité et la prudence⁵⁴. ∴ es termes s'appliquent dans les soins pour le corps (vv. 290-295 ; 303-307) et les vêtements (vv. 97-101), les aspirations amoureuses (vv. 354-357) ou dans les rapports aux autres (vv. 74-91). ∴ es recommandations apparaissent sans originalité. Néanmoins, le poème se distingue par trois traits spécifiques / tout d'abord, il ne présente guère d'attention aux manières de la table, sauf aux vers 107-108 : « Que l'on vive sagement dans le boire et le manger également » qui, elles, sont largement traitées dans un certain nombre de lex qui sont florées à l'époque⁵⁵ ; ensuite, il s'agit d'un très fort intérêt à la bonne conduite dans le domaine amoureux. ∴ es la partie érudite didactique appelée habituellement « pseudo-ovidienne » qui d'ailleurs abonde dans la manière de courtiser la jeune fille pour le soupireur qui doit « s'adonner au plaisir également / Equ'il chante, danse et qu'il soit gai » (vv. 281-282).

Pour un troisième point le plus original, le lex préconise également l'usage de la violence amoureuse dans ses fermes recommandations au jeune homme qui se trouve seul avec l'aimée (vv. 1236-1238 ; 1243-1250 ; 1260-1279). Les femmes sont exclues et présentes assez défavorablement ∴ certaines sont « dévotées » et vénales. Elles ne pensent qu'à prendre de l'argent pour de l'amour (vv. 371-373). ∴ es l'un regard masculin sans conscience alors que les lex didactiques qui s'adressent spécifiquement aux femmes prennent une toute autre forme. En effet, ils leur conseillent de pratiquer une vie honnête à travers la dévotion religieuse, la préservation de leur chasteté et de se préparer à devenir de bonnes et parfaites épouses à l'intérieur du foyer domestique⁵⁶.

bonnes manières, sur le bon comportement dans différentes situations et l'hygiène personnelle ; une brève description des personnes à qui il s'adresse – les clients et les laïcs – qui inclut différentes professions et métiers avec une attention spéciale portée aux plus jeunes (vv. 1-130). Ensuite, un ars amandi d'inspiration ovidienne, rédigé comme un manuel du séducteur pour apprendre au jeune homme la meilleure façon de séduire et de déflorer une jeune fille puis de garder son amour (vv. 131-320). L'auteur suit le plan du premier livre de l'Ars amandi (comment trouver une amoureuse) et du livre II (comment conserver son amour). Le Livre III, qui s'adresse aux femmes sur la manière de trouver un amant, n'est pas pris en considération. La troisième partie est un bref remedia amoris, c'est-à-dire qu'il aborde la manière de se débarrasser d'une amie, sous la forme d'une reprobatio feminae (vv. 321-384). Les vers 131-384, partie la plus importante du texte, définissent le bon amant et les cinq étapes de la conquête amoureuse et ils expliquent comment maintenir l'amour et in fine se débarrasser d'une femme qui ne plaît pas. Enfin, la quatrième partie insiste sur les devoirs de l'ami et de l'amant pour ensuite parler des devoirs des juges, médecins et des militaires et il se termine en donnant des conseils aux vieillards (vv. 385-510).

Le Facet Alan reprend, traduit et amplifie les trois premières parties de Moribus et Vita en omettant la dernière. Il se décompose comme suit :

- des conseils sur le bon comportement en rapport avec l'appartenance sociale, et quelques professions et métiers (vv. 1-351), fidèlement traduits des 150 premiers vers de Moribus et Vita et assez sensiblement augmentés.

- L'ars amandi proprement dit qui constitue une amplification considérable de la version latine puisque les 190 vers originaux en représentent plus d'un millier (vv. 352-1370). On peut les diviser en quatre groupes :

- * donner le jeune homme devra choisir sa cible ; par exemple, seulement des jeunes filles ou à défaut des veuves en tant qu'objet de séduction (vv. 352-391)

- * les premiers conseils pour une séduction réussie : cibler une seule personne à la fois ; gagner les faveurs de la jeune fille grâce à de bonnes manières courtoises afin qu'elle consente à donner son amour ; des conseils sur le bon comportement en rapport avec l'appartenance sociale ; séduire une femme du même milieu social ; établir les premiers contacts ; utiliser les services d'une messagère d'amour (vv. 392-487)

- * débiter la séduction. Dans cette partie au genre très significativement original qui passe de 81 à 422 vers (vv. 488-910). Le texte met à la disposition du séducteur des modèles de discours « clés en main » et prévoit les probables réactions de la jeune fille face à l'amant pressé.

- * le point culminant de la séduction : 458 vers (vv. 911-1369) pour 67 vers dans l'original. Le soupireur réussit à intéresser la jeune fille et l'auteur présente différents discours à tenir dans ces cas, en style direct et en insistant sur des mots et expressions qui la flatteront et qui s'appuient sur une forme rhétorique qui s'inspire du style troubadour *salut d'amour*⁵⁸. Cependant, la section principale porte sur la manière d'approcher physiquement sa conquête dans un but explicite de mariage sexuel mais sans oublier un comportement courtois et correct qui il faudra nuancer : « ne le compare comme un porc, mais tel un franc chevalier » (vv. 1169-1170). Le viol n'est pas permis : la femme doit également prendre du plaisir. Cette section se termine par des conseils sur la manière de reconforter la jeune fille qui pleure la perte de sa virginité résumée mais au final il lui est demandé qu'elle se doive pas s'engager ni promettre quoi que ce soit.

- dans cette dernière partie, les 64 vers de l'original deviennent 443 vers (vv. 1370-1743) et elle inclut une section finale (vv. 1601-1743) qui présente une reprobatio feminae mais dans un sens différent de Moribus et Vita puisque l'auteur sur la présumée malveillance du sexe féminin⁵⁹. Morel-Fatio pointe là « une diatribe terrible contre les femmes » bien plus violente que dans Moribus et Vita, seulement énucléée dans les derniers vers par quelques réserves⁶⁰.

II. Le Facet et ses inspirations

A. L'héritage d'Ovide

Le Facetus Moribus et Vita est dédié à l'expérience amoureuse (vv. 131-384). Un grand nombre de manuscrits de cette époque, qui circulaient sous forme d'excerpta, est à dire d'extraits, traités de ce thème qui en démontre le succès constants et jamais dément⁶¹. Puisant à la source de l'ars amandi ovidien, ils illustrent la manière de couriser une jeune femme et les moyens pour conserver son amour. Le Facet fait allusion à ces nombreux textes pseudo-ovidien composés entre les XIIe et XIIIe siècles, dont la célèbre comédie élégiaque Pamphilus, dans une période historique nommée aetas ovidiana où l'Ars Amatoria et les Remedia Amoris d'Ovide sont fortement imités⁶². D'ailleurs, l'histoire de la notation des textes ovidiens au Moyen-Age es unique⁶³. Leur valeur didactique et morale puisée à la source des Remedia et des Epistulae heroidum est largement commémorée et exploitée. On nous grâtes à des *accessus*⁶⁴, de courtes introductions aux textes étudiés dans les écoles, ceux-ci enseignaient à fuir les amours interdites et les passions éphémères à travers l'exempla virtutis de l'Antiquité classique. Plus explicitement encore est le cas de l'*Ars amandi et ethicae subponitur, quia de moribus puellarum loquitur*⁶⁵. Des l'imporant épisode de l'exil du poète Ovide qui permet une interprétation morale de son œuvre au Moyen Age car ce l'exil est considéré comme une « punition légitime »⁶⁶.

Il existe plusieurs déclinaisons du texte ovidien et l'Ovide praeceptor amoris, l'Ovide magister ethicae, et l'Ovide chrétien considéré comme le prophète du De vetula (il s'agit d'un poème anonyme en hexamètres attribué à Ovide jusqu'à le XVe siècle)⁶⁷. Dans le second des trois livres que compose le De vetula, un recueil attribué à Ovide – en effet il fut retrouvé en proximité de sa sépulture supposée –, le poète narre les événements de la vie qui l'ont amené à quitter les « jeux d'amour » et les « affaires mondaines », pour se consacrer exclusivement à la philosophie. Des l'principalement une aventure galante de jeunesse qui s'est mal terminée, et les ruses d'une vieille en remèdeuse (mezzana) qui lui a dévoilé toutes les illusions de la passion amoureuse. Le troisième livre, interprété comme une prophétie relative à la naissance, mort et résurrection du Christ, se termine par une prière de louange adressée à la Vierge. En outre, parmi ces nombreuses dédications du lex ovidien, existe l'Ovide maior, qui représente le corpus primaire des Métamorphoses, ce véritable « bible laïque », le premier grand recueil des fables mythologiques de l'Antiquité qui s'appliquent à l'exégèse allégorique et morale⁶⁸.

Il est également essentiel d'étudier le contexte social et culturel dans lequel l'œuvre s'est développée et pris son essor. Le Facet tient une place dans la culture catalane du Moyen-Âge. L'importante étude de Lola Badia⁶⁹ permet de distinguer trois modalités de diffusion du lex ovidien en Catalogne : d'abord, la tradition ovidienne indirecte en langue vulgaire (traditions, glosses, références lexicales, etc.) ; ensuite, les traductions des Héroïdes et des Métamorphoses par Guillem Nizoleu et Francesc Alegre ; enfin, les lexes pseudo-ovidien rédigés par de nombreuses poètes tels Jordi de Sant Jordi, Ausiàs March et Joan Rois de Torella, ainsi que par des écrivains comme Bernat Metge, Francesc Eiximenis et Joan Marbrell⁷⁰. Ils étaient probablement tous au fait du praeceptor amoris et du magister ethicae d'Ovide. La Cour royale catalane était un milieu important pour la diffusion de la tradition ovidienne, mais non le seul⁷¹. Une partie des œuvres d'Ovide étaient également connues à travers des anthologies largement diffusées dans les milieux lettrés⁷².

Il est intéressant de noter que dans sa fonction narrative, il existe de très fortes similitudes dans une conception de l'amour complètement dénué d'idéal courtois. Dans le Facet, comme dans l'Ars amandi ovidien, l'amour n'est pas la dévotion ou l'idéalisation d'une dame ; l'amour n'est pas une source de vertu chrétienne qui apporte joy et alegransa, mais plutôt un enjeu de galanterie, un sentiment de frivolité pour l'accomplissement de la conquête amoureuse. L'ars du Facet se présente comme un ensemble cohérent de conseils pour « atteindre la conquête ». Le choix de la « proie » se base sur des critères d'utilité pratique et de convenance sociale. Enfin, et surtout, la stratégie amoureuse est largement basée sur l'emploi de la force. Le vernis courtois ne doit pas faire illusion. Ainsi, celui qui réussit à embrasser la femme et qui en suite n'obtient plus rien d'elle est un succès (vv. 1200 et suiv.) ; Le jovensel doit toujours mettre en pratique une stratégie amoureuse, en exprimant parfois de la tristesse, parfois de la joie et se montrer un orateur timide ou passionné quand les circonstances le nécessitent.⁷³ Le jeu amoureux basé sur une trahison dupliquée et troubardaise.

B. L'influence courtoise

Dans la partie consacrée à l'Ars amandi ovidien, on remarque que la narration en vers est parfois enrichie de passages en style direct utilisés lorsque le jeune homme parvient à la conquête de la jeune femme. Les innovations de l'auteur anonyme. Il n'existe aucune correspondance avec le modèle latin. Dans le Facet Catalan on rencontre des phases de dialogue et de narration qui s'évaluent de la première rencontre entre les amants jusqu'à la conquête amoureuse. Dans les passages dialogués, on retrouve tous les protagonistes de l'jovensel, l'enfanteuse (mezzana), la puella et ses amies.

La voix narrative, sans aucun doute l'amoureux emploie un ton lyrique dans la tradition des troubadours. On peut constater aux vers 666-821 qui traduisent les vers 209-242 du Facetus la présence de thèmes érotiques dans la courtoisie et les vers de la femme ; la soumission de l'amoureux, prêt à refuser la voie qui l'amène au Paradis⁷⁴. Traduit du latin famulus, des termes comme vostre hom (vv. 788, 879), servidor (v. 789) expriment la métaphore de l'amour considéré comme un service féodal⁷⁵.

Si on se tourne vers la description conventionnelle de la puellae (v. 712 et suiv.) qui se base sur la beauté de la femme, on relève les adjectifs tels que daurats (v. 712), resplendent, clara (v. 723), luents (v. 732), qui indiquent la lumière et la splendeur⁷⁶. Les vers 943-1067 s'inspirent du genre de l'epistolae amoureuse, autrement dit le salut d'amour, porté à son plus haut degré par Arnaut de Mareuil. On peut signaler la présence de ce thème à travers la figure de style de l'anaphore, souvent incluse dans les formules de salut qui portent sur la manière franche et directe de se rapprocher de la dame, et dans des expressions telles que Deus vos saul (v. 495). Le terme insistant propre de la descriptio puellae, rapproché de certaines caractéristiques typiques du salut d'amour plus que de la chanson d'amour⁷⁷.

Des tópoi sont fréquents dans les poèmes catalans comme l'a nous le Març de Riquer. La source de ces motifs doit sans doute être recherchée dans la culture troubadour, dominante en Catalogne à cette époque⁷⁸. L'effusion amoureuse est présente dans la lyrique courtoise. Pour autant, selon Francesc Ziiino, bien que saturé de références courtoises, manquent dans le Facet les éléments typiques de ce univers et c'est bien ce qui le démarque véritablement de son modèle latin⁷⁹. Le Facet montre, a contrario, l'absence quasi totale d'idéal courtois. L'utilisation du langage troubadour est purement rhétorique. Nous ne retrouvons pas les lletrs d'amor, mais seulement des arguments pour atténuer la conquête amoureuse. On peut le constater aux vers « gin parlar, mans e humil » (l'aman doit adopter une « voix agréable, douce et soumise ») (v. 1110) et surtout dans l'allusion principale (v. 1113-1150). Le jeune aman va alors dévoiler toute sa vanité (v. 903-909). Toutes ces louanges ne sont-elles pas que des expédients pour avancer masqué et tromper la jeune femme ? Après le long salut d'amour (vv. 943-1067), la ruse est dévoilée et l'amoureux est exhorté à utiliser la manière forte pour arriver à ses fins : « Jouanç rianç tu ne do is pas erret / an d'elles t'isses, an d'elles flants, / par toi qu'ils soient souvent palpés ; / e me s-lui la main à la gorge, / palpe en outre les seins, / e serre-les un peu, / poin trop, / car ce ne sera plus du jeu, / ... / la t'isse e le ventre de m'ême » (vv. 1223-1229). L'aboutissement d'une arme de séduction efficace dans la bataille amoureuse.

Les distiques de ce de parlie (« le cors honraç lo loç on vos escaç » (v. 944) / « il noble li lon vos pausaç » (v. 946), « l'ayga on vos balejas, lo çap ela » (vv. 952-953), sont fortement inspirés du Salut IV de Arnaud de Mareuil. Un troubadour salue la dame et complimente ses nobles qualités : la beauté, l'élégance, la politesse, etc. Par contre, le poème catalan, plus pragmatique sans doute, nomme également des objets de la vie quotidienne : le lit, la table (vv. 945-946).

Si nous considérons le rapport entre le jeune aman et la destinataire du message amoureux, il semble que nous évoluons dans un univers bourgeois lié au commerce, plutôt que dans les milieux de l'aristocratie courtoise. Il est significatif qu'en ce les jeunes filles et l'amoureux, l'enjeu semble soit une courtisane, la sartroresa (v. 459). D'autre part le jeune homme songe à devenir juge, écrivain, médecin, marchand ou clerc (vv. 199-201) et l'auteur insiste sur les livres qu'il faut aimer (v. 203). Il est donc à faire constater que le métier de poète a disparu alors qu'il est bien présent dans Moribus et Vita, remplacé par la fasia, fisicia (v. 65-68), c'est-à-dire le « médecin ».

Il est intéressant de noter les ressemblances formelles entre le Facet et la deuxième vulgarisation pseudo-ovidienne qui nous soit parvenue de Catalogne, l'Ovidi enamorat de Bernat Metge⁸⁰. Un homme l'a relevé Francesc Ziiino qui reprend Lola Badia, dans l'œuvre de Metge l'amour n'est jamais une dimension spirituelle qui enno-blie mais une passion sensuelle qui mène vers la recherche du plaisir⁸¹. Textes d'inspiration ovidienne, le Facet et l'Ovidi enamorat sont très proches chronologiquement. Ils émanent d'une vision émanée du sentiment amoureux.

Conclusion

En conclusion, posons notre attention sur la critique féroce portée contre les femmes (vv. 1373-1743), et qui constitue le final du poème. Bien qu'il soit inspiré du Facetus latin (vv. 323-384), à partir du vers 1600 l'auteur catalan s'en éloigne formellement et développe de nouveaux thèmes par rapport au Moribus et vita et aux Remedia amoris ovidiennes. Dans le Facetus latin il y a moins de vers voués à des attaques contre les femmes même s'ils ne sont pas absents⁸². Il manque notamment des éléments qui dans le Facet catalan sont repris de la tradition misogyne, d'origine biblique ou patristique. Ce texte appartient bien à la « littérature misogyne » en vogue aux XIV^e et XV^e siècles⁸³. La femme est perçue comme une figure de l'infonction, d'origine, d'hygiène. Elle est une proie pour assouvir ses passions dans le droit fil de la vision chrétienne de l'Éden où Eve trompe Adam ; on trouve trace de références à de mauvaises femmes décrites dans la Bible. La culpabilité d'Ève dans la mort du Christ est même soulignée aux vers 1641-1648. Le texte reprend des éléments de la tradition troubadour, et les vers 1696-1713 rappellent les strophes II-IV de la chanson de Marcabruno Soudadier, per cui es Jovens qui stigmatise les vices propres aux *falsas putas ardens*⁸⁴. Dans le poème catalan, de même que dans la chanson de Marcabruno, la fembra vil est comparée à la chimère, monstre mythologique dont la tête de lion, le corps de chèvre et la queue du serpent symbolisent l'orgueil, l'luxure et la fausseté (vv. 1696 et ss.). S'il est vrai que la presque totalité du Facet constitue un pseudo-Ars amatoria et un pseudo-Remedia amoris ovidiens, ces éléments ne sont pas exclusifs et il est difficile de parler uniquement d'une « doctrine amoureuse » dans ce texte. Le manuel du parfait séducteur n'est autre qu'une composition fondue dans un discours plus complexe, où dans une finalité didactique il énonce des normes de comportement et de savoir-vivre où l'emploi de la force pour arriver à ses fins est prégnant. Tout en critiquant et blâmant la fembra vil (vv. 1392, 1635, 1668, 1694). On peut faire sienne la réflexion de Jean Frappier et l'appliquer au Facet : « un amoureux possède en principe les mérites généraux de la courtoisie, mais un héros de roman peut avoir une haute réputation de courtoisie sans qu'il se conduise en adepte et en modèle de l'amour courtois »⁸⁵. Dans le cas présent, le Facet enseigne à l'amoureux de se comporter comme un héros de roman.

FASSET⁸⁶

- 1) Seigneur/ Sire, moi qui veux être Courtois
- 2) bien éduqué et versé dans les bonnes manières,
- 3) viens écouter ce roman,
- 4) moi qui veux enrichir d'enseignements.
- 5) Ce roman s'appelle Fasset,
- 6) les meilleurs préceptes en feuilles, je promets,
- 7) que jamais vous ne puissiez entendre
- 8) ou écouter pour en tirer des leçons profitables ;
- 9) et celui qui voudra s'instruire
- 10) y trouvera maintes choses
- 11) sur l'éducation de la Courtoisie.
- 12) Chaque jour, s'en instruira
- 13) le Clerc et le Chevalier,
- 14) le bourgeois et le marchand
- 15) l'enfant ainsi que le vieillard ;
- 16) tous en tireront de bons conseils
- 17) et s'en instruiront en toutes situations,
- 18) s'ils lisent souvent ce roman.
- 19) Il en est ainsi pour moi qui veux être Courtois,
- 20) bien éduqué et versé en bonnes manières,
- 21) porté à l'humilité
- 22) et prompt à la bonté.
- 23) Veuille ne pas être menteur
- 24) mais être franc en toute occasion.
- 25) Aie le cœur ferme et tranquille,
- 26) si à tous tu veux être agréable ;
- 27) et ne sois pas susceptible,
- 28) ou trop mauvais, ou trop râleur ;
- 29) fais montre de foi et de loyaauté
- 30) et tu seras de tous fort aimé.
- 31) Car celui qui est fou et sans foi,
- 32) on ne le croit jamais pour quoi que ce soit
- 33) Mais si cela arrive une fois quelque par
- 34) mentir ne nuit pas, pourvu que cela dure peu,
- 35) Car dévoiler les vérités
- 36) des autres brise les amitiés.
- 37) Tu cacheras le péché de l'ami
- 38) au tant que tu pourras, ou tu le dissimuleras.
- 39) Si tu veux être bon et Courtois
- 40) et recevoir des compliments en toute franchise,

⁸⁶ Je remercie vivement don Pedro Masado pour sa traduction du fasset catalan.

- 41) sois agréable, modéré
- 42) au fond de toi, en sachant de quoi tu parles.
- 43) Veuille ne pas trop parler
- 44) ou raconter de vilains propos
- 45) on te tiendra pour une personne triviale
- 46) et aussi pour quelqu'un de mal éduqué.
- 47) Et lorsque tu voudras louer quelqu'un
- 48) et donner de ses nouvelles,
- 49) fais en la louange avec retenue.
- 50) Ne que tu diras véritablement
- 51) ce qu'à son sujet tu auras raconté
- 52) que ce soit toujours bien la vérité ;
- 53) car si tu dis des choses qui au contraire n'existent pas
- 54) ce sera du déshonneur complètement
- 55) sur tout quand tu en parleras
- 56) quelque part ; et là-dessus tu ne dois pas faillir.
- 57) Mais veuillez ne pas le faire sur tout
- 58) car on ne considérera comme un nigaud.
- 59) Ne que tu voudras dire ou énoncer,
- 60) dans ton cœur, tu dois y réfléchir
- 61) celui qui parle spontanément
- 62) est ainsi qu'un cheval à qui on a lâché la bride ;
- 63) à ce sujet le sage Salomon a dit
- 64) que jamais le bavardage,
- 65) et le fait de trop parler n'importe quand,
- 66) jamais ne furent pas un péché.
- 67) Ainsi celui qui veut demeurer courtois
- 68) doit prononcer peu de paroles.
- 69) Et ce lui qui veut être agréable
- 70) à tout le monde, ainsi doit se composer
- 71) veuillez ne pas être présumés.
- 72) A tous les hommes, les bons et les preux,
- 73) toujours montre un visage souriant.
- 74) Et sois agréable également
- 75) une grande qualité est en celui, pour sûr,
- 76) qui est bien disposé pour cela.
- 77) Toujours fais preuve de réflexion,
- 78) et rejette les gens qui sont présumés,
- 79) afin que tu ne sois méprisé
- 80) d'aucun homme avisé.
- 81) Et sois bien studieux
- 82) et soigneux dans ton métier,
- 83) avec sagesse et bons conseils,
- 84) tu ne failliras pas une seule fois.

- 85) On dit que la pratique rend l'homme maître 86) en quelque art qu'il veuille se mettre.
87) Et lorsqu'il verra qu'on veut le faire
88) se disputer avec violence,
89) alors qu'il n'aille pas rousseler
90) ni faire mauvaise figure.
91) Ainsi tu feras, selon les capitales ;
92) pour que ta raison ne te laisse pas aller à la dépense,
93) car celui qui dépense plus qu'il ne gagne
94) est plus tard qu'il en aura besoin.
95) En toute situation, il faut de la bonne mesure
96) car sans elle rien ne dure.
97) Tu dois prendre soin de te vêtir correctement
98) qu'on ne puisse te moquer,
99) et de ne pas aller pas te promener crasseux
100) mais propre, dedans et dehors.
101) Et celui qui a peu de vêtements 102)
103) ainsi comme vous l'avez déjà entendu,
104) si vous ne l'avez déjà jeté dans l'oubli.
105) Mais pour se vêtir et se chausser
106) on ne doit pas oublier son métier.
107) Que l'on vive sagement
108) dans le boire et le manger également
109) Et que la plume soit laissée
110) dans la main de celui qui la tient
111) pour raconter toutes choses.
112) Ainsi il appartient aux écrivains
113) que l'on apprenne selon les bonnes règles
114) à vivre dans le monde avec éducation.
115) Tu dois plonger ton fils dans la science
116) afin qu'il suive une bonne voie,
117) et pas seulement par la lecture.
118) Mais pour qu'il puisse mieux en tirer profit
119) alors, que le maître le châtie
120) pour qu'il ne s'égare pas dans le mauvais chemin.
121) On dit que celui qui ne bat pas un jeune merdeux
122) ne peut ensuite battre un gueux.
123) Afin qu'il ne puisse folâtrer
124) fais lui fréquenter des hommes âgés,
125) car si avec des vieillards il se fait ami
126) il ne pourra se fourvoyer ou faire des folies.
127) Tiens le prévenu sur le fait d'être agité, 128) car ceux qui sont trop remuants

- 129) risquen d'avoir le jugement trop léger.
- 130) S'il a acquis peu de bonnes manières
- 131) honne il aura quand il sera grand.
- 132) Pour toute raison, plaise toujours
- 133) Ceux qui plurent une fois dès le début
- 134) Et celui qui fait preuve de pureté
- 135) depuis sa jeunesse jusqu'à l'âge mûr
- 136) pour toujours être honnête et chaste,
- 137) se doit de la préserver de toute ébourderie.
- 138) Et en ce qui concerne le respect des règles,
- 139) ne cesse d'en tenir compte nuit et jour
- 140) jusqu'à ce que tu sois empreint de droiture
- 141) Comme on dit de l'or pur qu'il est inaltérable.
- 142) Sois vaillant et bien avisé
- 143) studieux en toute chose
- 144) et prends également ta profession
- 145) afin de ne pas être tenu pour sot
- 146) et d'être capable de répandre plus dignement
- 147) la parole de Dieu tout puissant.
- 148) C'est un grand déshonneur pour ceux
- 149) qui abandonnent leur amour propre rien,
- 150) car la souillure, qui pour certains est une récompense,
- 151) dit-ils vous qu'elle ne vaut pas un sou.
- 152) Quand l'auréole a sa légèreté
- 153) elle paraît plus blanche, fait-elle que tu dis
- 154) afin que tout soit bien clair,
- 155) car ainsi on doit poursuivre le chemin de sa vie.
- 156) Toute personne bien élevée doit ses membres ouvrir
- 157) avec des chausses seyant et de long vêtement,
- 158) sur tout s'il s'agit de membres d'enfants
- 159) et d'autant plus s'il s'agit de chrétiens.
- 160) C'est un déshonneur pour eux un très grand déshonneur
- 161) s'ils faisaient voir leur chair nue.
- 162) C'est hanger souvent les habits,
- 163) être pur par la façon de s'habiller
- 164) et dénué de tout péché,
- 165) C'est ainsi que tu seras honoré.
- 166) Sois sage et bien soigneux,
- 167) et très réservé,
- 168) et porte toi à respecter les aveugles bon sens,
- 169) et observe bien les commandements.
- 170) Et si Dieu t'a donné du bien
- 171) ne sois pas attaché en faveurs
- 172) et au tout homme, à ce que je sache

- 173) ne fera preuve de plus grande courtoisie,
 174) puisque ce que tu as est bien suffisant
 175) pour toi mais peut-être aussi pour un autre.
 176) Quand tu seras vieux et un homme honoré
 177) pour les années et ton grand âge
 178) tu donneras des conseils au peuple,
 179) tu lui donneras de bons exemples
 180) afin qu'il suive toujours les règles de l'honnêteté.
 181) Et ton nom sera cité en référence
 182) de sorte que le peuple avec toi
 183) ne pourra se fourvoyer ou tomber dans le péché.
 184) Des préceptes tu lui enseigneras
 185) et tu lui indiqueras la manière
 186) de se conformer à une vie harmonieuse.
 187) Et de la raison brièvement
 188) quelle chose est bien pour l'homme,
 189) et laquelle lui plaît et lui convient
 190) Premièrement si tu as des enfants
 191) un certain art de vivre tu leur montreras
 192) et ainsi tu leur prouveras
 193) que, s'ils se conduisent ainsi,
 194) ils pourront vivre selon leurs compétences.
 195) Par les hommes de bonne naissance
 196) transmets-leur tous à leurs enfants
 197) quelle est la façon de vivre la plus valorisante.
 198) Si la littérature leur plaît et qu'ils aient envie de s'instruire 199) ou d'être d'une grande sagesse,
 200) ainsi que le ferai un juge,
 201) un savant, un médecin, un grand écrivain,
 202) peulà peul apprend leur à aimer
 203) les livres, car ainsi on doit faire
 204) si on veut que les enfants soient instruits, 205) même s'ils veulent pratiquer l'art de l'équitation,
 206) prendre soin des chevaux
 207) en brossant leur poil véritablement
 208) afin qu'ils deviennent plus savants.
 209) On dit que si un enfant a des aptitudes,
 210) il n'en sera pas plus compétent pour ce la plus tard
 211) et il doit être d'abord éduqué
 212) avant que d'être chevalier
 213) et qu'il fasse l'apprentissage volontiers
 214) s'il veut être complimenté par tous.
 215) Et s'il ne veut pas être chevalier
 216) et qu'il veuille être marchand,

- 217) dis lui qu'il apprenne à connaître 218) les monnaies avec précision.
 219) Premièrement il doit faire en sorte
 220) d'apprendre à bien composer.
 221) Qu'il soit d'un esprit vif et qu'il soit pugnace
 222) comme un marchand sage et avisé.
 223) Qu'il recherche les lieux qu'il faut
 224) pour faire des affaires également
 225) Pour que personne ne puisse le tromper facilement
 226) qu'il sache et qu'il lui les exerce également
 227) Car on dit que ce la vaut la peine.
 228) S'il ne veut pas être marchand,
 229) Et s'il désire d'être forgeron,
 230) Ce qui exige de la discipline
 231) il est nécessaire qu'il ne soit pas paresseux
 232) puisque à celui qui apprend peu,
 233) lorsqu'il est d'un âge avancé,
 234) un bon savoir-faire est nécessaire.
 235) Si alors il n'est plus un jeune garçon
 236) Et s'il est grand et qu'il a du poil,
 237) et qu'il ne sache faire aucun métier
 238) Il nous faut alors lui faire honneur,
 239) lui indiquer comment apprendre maintenant
 240) bien qu'il soit vieux, oui encore,
 241) Car il vaut mieux avoir un métier qui est pour de vrai. (un vrai métier)
 242) Souvent j'en entendis rapporter ce qui suit
 243) bête est l'homme qui se moque
 244) de celui qui n'a aucun métier.
 245) L'art de vivre et de penser
 246) n'empêche pas l'homme d'être mauvais.
 247) Mais ce pendant ainsi doit faire
 248) celui qui veut être d'une sagesse accomplie,
 249) celui qui aime celui à qui il est
 250) et qui veut le demander à savoir.
 251) Le savoir ne me sert pas en valeur
 252) Et ne procure aucun profit et aucun richesse.
 253) Et la seule chose qui est naturelle,
 254) de prendre femme, ce n'est pas une chose raisonnable pour l'homme ?
 255) Et la nature produit beaucoup d'hommes
 256) bienheureux, riches et joyeux,
 257) pour diverses professions véritablement
 258) Et ainsi tout homme dans le monde a 259) la possibilité de faire quelque chose parfaitement
 260) On ne doit pas avoir plusieurs métiers,

- 261) Car peu de profit on peut en retirer.
 262) N'a-t-on dans sa première profession
 263) peut-être bon, à moins d'être soigné
 264) pourvu qu'il l'aime bien de son cœur
 265) sans paresse cachée ou apparente.
 266) Ne donne de conseils à personne
 267) Et oublie les tracas de la vie.
 268) Ainsi par le fait de beaucoup travailler
 269) L'homme mourra sans regret. (sans remords)
 270) Mais l'homme doit reposer son corps
 271) dans les périodes de fêtes.
 272) Qu'il travaille afin de pouvoir vivre
 273) avec joie, avec plaisir et rire,
 274) Car ces choses la vie embellie
 275) par un bon esprit en est anoblie, 276) lorsqu'on se voit dans un état joyeux
 277) et que l'on veut que cela dure.
 278) Mais ce lui qui donne de la tristesse
 279) vit avec grande avarice.
 280) Et le jeune homme dans sa jeunesse,
 281) qu'il s'adonne au plaisir également
 282) Et qu'il chante, danse et qu'il soit gai
 283) Car dans un an il en aura moins à vivre ?
 284) Et qu'il soit agréable à tous
 285) sagement ou qu'il sache le faire
 286) et qu'il soit amoureux
 287) s'il veut avoir son cœur heureux.
 288) Mais ce pendant que l'on donne
 289) pour un moment pour un temps.
 290) Et qu'il prenne soin de ses cheveux.
 291) De même qu'il ne les colore pas en noir,
 292) Car ce n'est que leur utilisation par les hommes âgés
 293) et elle ne convient pas aux jeunes gens.
 294) Et qu'il les tienne bien peignés,
 295) et mieux qu'il les arrange avec goût
 296) Le jeune homme qui se promène tranquille
 297) et malpropre, à l'intérieur comme à l'extérieur,
 298) d'une femme et d'un homme bien nés
 299) Ne sera aimé ni apprécié.
 300) Mais lorsqu'il est plus vieux et d'un âge plus avancé, 301) cela ne fait plus partie de ses soucis.
 302) Car lorsque c'est la valeur humaine qui compte le plus 303) on ne se soucie pas d'avoir une tenue bien soignée.
 304) Mais ce lui qui veut être courtois,

- 305) qu'il ne garde pas les cheveux longs 306) Car la longue chevelure
307) fait partie des attributs féminins.
308) Qu'il se comporte de façon agréable et coquette,
309) ainsi que de la esdiçhi-dessus.
310) Qu'il soit les, modéré et agile,
311) et bien à l'aise dans ses mouvements.
312) Qu'il prenne soin de se hausser correctement
313) de chausures et même de chaussettes.
314) Lorsqu'il s'apprête, que soient les fesses,
315) les cuisses, les jambes privées de poils. (qu'on ne voit pas les poils).
316) Mais que de la soit fait selon les usages 317) du lieu impérieusement
318) Car si on veut se singulariser
319) on sera considéré comme un clown.
320) Il faut vraiment que le jeune homme
321) soit enjoué parmi les enjoués
322) et qu'il soit risqué avec les risés,
323) et passante et affligé.
324) Qu'il reste et la compagnie des hommes âgés,
325) pour qu'il prenne de bons conseils.
326) Qu'il entre dans des relations avec les bons,
327) et que doit faire de toute façon chaque jeune homme, 328) Car tel ui qui fréquente les bons
329) ne peut suivre la mauvaise route
330) et dispense à l'attention avec discernement
331) hommages et compliments publiquement
332) Veuillez ne mépriser qui que ce soit
333) même s'il est misérablement
334) et veuillez donner toute sa place au faible. (respecter le faible)
335) Incline la tête en présence des grands.
336) Veuillez toujours montrer un visage
337) attentif et digne honorer
338) Tel ui ou ceux à qui véritablement
339) tu dois de rendre hommage.
340) Ne sois pas parmi les grands
341) trop prolix en paroles
342) et reiens pareillement dans les pensées
343) et que tu voudras dire ou proposer
344) Car on doit se tenir de trop parler
345) sage est ce lui qui sait s'abstenir.
346) Veu x que l'on voit se comporter avec sagesse,
347) avec eux on doit aller de compagnie.
348) Et vous bien tous leurs propos,

- 349) parmi eux, Compore moi de manière plaisante 350) Car à chose insensée l'insensé,
 351) bon sens et raison lui le forgeras.
 352) Mais si tu ne veux pas, par aventure
 353) de ces choses avoir cure
 354) et que tu veuilles tomber amoureux
 355) et d'adonner à l'amour des femmes,
 356) sache faire son profit
 357) de ce que sur ce sujet j'ai dit ci-dessus.
 358) Tu commenceras alors d'aimer
 359) ainsi que là je veux le dire.
 360) Tu le dois d'éviter la nonne sacrée
 361) qui a été choisie comme épouse du Diable
 362) et le péché de l'adultère
 363) et l'âme, dedans et dehors.
 364) Des femmes qui ont un mari
 365) tu le garderas, n'oublie pas cela,
 366) Car c'est pareillement un péché du même ordre.
 367) Aussi sois serein dans ton cœur.
 368) Garde-toi des prostituées
 369) et sur tout des dévoyées
 370) Car cet amour ne durera
 371) que le temps de le prendre son premier argent
 372) La femme vile ne donne de l'amour
 373) que si l'homme est un large donateur

Ultimele decenii au adus pe piața de carte din România un număr mare de lucrări destinate învățării limbii române ca limbă străină, redactate în conformitate cu exigențele de la nivel internațional. În aceeași direcție de modernizare și raliere la standardele contemporane se înscrie și manualul celor două cadre didactice ale Universității din Constanța: Cristina-Valentina Dafinoiu și Laura-Elena Pascale.

Limba română: manual pentru studenții străini din anul pregătitor (Nivel A1-A2) cuprinde 18 unități, dintre care 3 unități recapitulative, și o secțiune de Anexe ce include tabele și secțiuni sinoptice pentru noțiunile de morfologie abordate în manual: articolul hotărât și articolul nehotărât, flexiunea substantivului, tipuri de adjective și grade de comparație, tipuri de pronume, paradigme de conjugare verbală pentru indicativ, numeralul cardinal, prepoziții și locuțiuni prepoziționale.

După cum se menționează și în titlu, principalul utilizator pentru care a fost gândit acest manual este studentul străin din anul pregătitor, la care se adaugă acei străini interesați să obțină „cunoștințe minime de limba română” (Cuvânt înainte, p. 9). Așadar, încadrează lucrarea la nivelurile A1-A2 din cadrul European Common de Referință, deși conținuturile morfosintactice ale unităților și vocabularul lecțiilor, cu mici excepții, nu acoperă integral nivelul A2.

Principiile care stau la baza redactării manualului, prezentate în deschiderea lucrării, au fost următoarele: la nivel de conținut, o distribuție echilibrată a competențelor lingvistice (înțelegerea discursului oral, comunicarea orală, înțelegerea textului scris, comunicarea scrisă), la nivel de formă, susținerea fragmentelor de text prin imagini clare, sugestive.

Tematica unităților acoperă descriptorii europeni pentru nivelul inițial: înțelegere și interacțiune verbală cu privire la propria persoană și la elemente din mediul înconjurător, redactarea unor enunțuri simple. Lecțiile au un conținut interesant, majoritatea constând în secvențe dialogale pe teme de interes general (vremea, orașul, cursuri, la supermarket, locuința, la restaurant, la spectacol) sau descriptive (cu elemente de cultură și civilizație românească: caracteristici de climă, obiective turistice etc.), construite după modelul limbii vorbite actuale.

Fiecare unitate se deschide cu o casetă rezumativ-introductivă (Vom învăța despre), în care sunt anunțați și conținutul morfologic și lexical ce urmează a fi tratați în unitatea respectivă. Modul de structurare a unei unități pleacă de la un text de lecție, urmat de secțiunea Vocabular, în care sunt cuprinse cuvintele și structurile lexicale mai importante din lecția respectivă, o secțiune de morfologie și una de exerciții.

Ordinea de predare a itemilor de morfologie respectă, în cea mai mare parte, succesiunea din Manualul manual universitar Brâncuș, ordine consacrată, cu eficiență dovedită în cele peste trei decenii de la debut. Adoptarea ei de către autoare demonstrează experiență în predarea românei ca limbă străină.

Manualul reușește să evite supraîncărcarea cu elemente de metalimbaj, ceea ce reprezintă un avantaj pentru utilizatorii nefilologi. Un alt avantaj al manualului este dată de diversitatea exercițiilor: atât exerciții clasice de tip substituție (simplă sau prin expansiune), dar și exerciții structurale de repetare, transformare, îmbinare, precum și secvențe dialogale sau descrieri de imagini.

Lucrarea este accesibilă și încearcă să gradeze cunoștințele astfel încât să nu suprasolicite utilizatorul și să rămână eficientă. Autoarele, cel mai probabil, au totuși în mod repetat pe baza unei experiențe didactice îndelungate, cele mai bune conținuturi și formule de predare.

Micile imperfecțiuni inerente în lucrările de acest tip, semnalați mai jos, nu influențează valoarea certă a lucrării. Introducerea unor verbe neregulate sau a unor verbe cu particularități de scriere (a bea, a veni) în tabelele cu modele de conjugare pentru tipurile de conjugări ale românei nu reprezintă cea mai bună alegere, din perspectiva unui străin care învață limba română. În general, mult mai eficient este să se predea regula și paradigmele conforme cu aceasta și abia apoi să se introducă paradigme cu particularități (alternanțe vocalice sau consonantice, caracteristici de scriere, verbe neregulate etc.), model conform cu etapele cognitive de învățare (înțelegerea și organizarea logică a materialului, însușirea cunoștințelor, fixarea și reactualizarea, prin trecerea de la general la particular). În secțiunea de vocabular de la pagina 20 conjuncțiile dar și iar sunt date împreună, putând fi înțelese ca sinonime ce pot fi substituite una cu cealaltă indiferent de context în timp ce româna are și un iar copulativ, ilustrat de altfel de autoare în lecția respectivă.

Partea grafică a fost interesant gândită pentru a răspunde mai multor funcții: explicitează tematica lecției, are rol ostensiv – identificând și fixând anumiți referenți – sau se constituie în elemente introductive pentru exercițiile de comunicare orală. Nu putem să nu remarcăm modernitatea acestei părți grafice: alternanța fonemelor, utilizarea unor simboluri frecvențe în comunicarea pe dispozitive electronice: emoji, hash tag etc. O nouă ediție ar putea adăuga elemente de policromie și un suport audio pentru un plus de valoare al lucrării.
